Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to vary the rule which seems to have been observed so far to-day, and to discuss this bill. I know of no more important legislation pending before this House at the present session.

I yield to no man in my admiration for the distinguished chairman of this great committee [Mr. ADAMSON], and I yield to no man in my admiration for the personnel of this, one of the most important committees in the House. The measures which they have reported out have been absolutely nonpartisan, and this measure is, as it ought to be, absolutely nonpartisan. Before reporting the other measures submitted by this committee, they have given careful consideration to them, sometimes extending over long periods—weeks and months—and have held exhaustive hearings. I have found it possible to support every provision of every bill reported by this committee during this Congress or the last Congress. I regret exceedingly that I can not support this measure. In my judgment, it has not received the careful consideration always given by this committee to the bills they have reported out and have championed upon this floor.

They are absolutely frank in the position they take with reference to this bill. They speak for one school in this country—the school which believes in developing the rivers of this country at any kind of cost. This bill is in entire harmony with the policy of this committee in dealing with structures heretofore erected or proposed to be erected in our rivers where there are declivities. They frankly admit that their object is to attract capital to the rivers, to make it possible to build in the rivers dams that the Government does not feel able to build, to improve the navigation of the rivers, and incidentally to develop the latent power in our rivers wherever there are declivities down which the rivers flow on toward the sea. This is their position. It has always been their position. This bill is not a conservation measure in any sense in which the term is used, and they do not claim that it is.

I do not want to be offensive to this committee, for whose membership I entertain so much respect, but as I view the bill the effect of it and the intended effect of it is to subsidize the great water-power groups in this country and bring about in that way these improvements in our rivers. And the attempt is, so far as this committee is concerned, absolutely nonpartisan. I understand there are Democrats on the committee who are opposed to the bill, but they have not filed minority views. I know of no Republicans on the committee who are opposed to this measure.

This bill will not accomplish what the committee thinks it will accomplish, in my judgment. It does not change in the least the policy of treating our rivers which has heretofore prevailed—a policy which has kept capital, to a considerable extent, away from the rivers.

What capital needs before it will invest in an enterprise of this kind is some assurance on the part of Congress, the adoption of some policy, which will make the investment secure for a definite term of years; which will yield the investors the returns they ought to have. This bill does not do that. Under this measure they must apply hereafter separately to Congress in the matter of each dam they propose to build. The old policy of passing through both Houses of Congress a separate permit will go on in the future just as it has in the past, and the old fights against each bill will be renewed every time a bill is presented, every permit will be revocable, and this bill itself provides only for revocable permits. It provides that whenever Congress decides that the conditions of consent have been violated there shall be a forfeiture. This is the sort of thing that does not invite capital to our rivers. This bill is a frank and avowed attempt to subsidize the water-power groups of the country. The attempt will, in my judgment, fail, and, of course, it ought to fail.

The consideration this measure has received in the committee does not entitle it to the respect on the floor that measures usually reported by this committee are entitled to receive. Heretofore the policy has been to report out bills granting to any group of persons who asked for permission to build a dam in a navigable river permission to build that dam. All they had to do was to ask for it. It made no difference as to their financial standing, as to whether or not they represented any particular water-power group, as to whether or not it was merely speculative on their part. All they had to do was to ask for the permission and the committee reported out a bill.

Now, it was that sort of thing against which some of us, a majority of us, in this House rebelled recently, and it was that sort of thing which makes necessary the adoption of a general water-power policy. The fight will go on; if unfortunately this bill should pass, that fact will not stop the conservation fight in the least. There were no hearings on this bill. The opponents of a measure of this character were well known, but none of them were given an opportunity to be heard; it was not intended to give the other side the slightest consideration, and that intention was carried out in every particular. Members of this House who introduced bills on this subject were given no opportunity to present their ideas to this committee. Two gentlemen only were permitted to testify. They came from distances a thousand miles away. From a thousand miles away they brought here Hugh L. Cooper, a water-power magnate, who admits he is, who admits in his testimony that he represents that side of the case, and they heard him. He was the engineer who promoted and built the dam across the Mississippi River at Keokuk. From a thousand miles away, down in Alabama, they brought another water-power magnate, J. W. Worthington, of Sheffield, Ala., who appeared before the committee and addressed them; and upon the testimony of these two, the greatest water-power magnates of this country, interested only on the capitalistic side of the question, this bill was framed. Of course they got what they wanted. This bill is drawn in the interest of the water-power grabbers of the country; in the form in which it comes from the committee it is absolutely indefensible. Even if, unfortunately for the country, it passes, it may not accomplish what it is intended to accomplish.

In his speech the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] relies largely for his facts on the statements made by these two gentlemen, many of them absolutely misleading. No man was given the opportunity to contradict them. The water conservationists of the country were not heard in any particular, but were dismissed, in the report which accompanies this bill, with the statement that they are honest but misguided individuals, who were standing in the way of the economic advance in this country, so far as water power is concerned.

After the bill was reported out, at a late hour in the afternoon, when but few Members were on the floor, this bill was given a privileged status at the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the majority leader, the privileged status that it now occupies, and which makes it possible to consider it at this time. If his request had been made at a more seasonable hour, it would not have been granted.

Under these circumstances there is no reason why Members of this House should surround this bill with the halo that bills usually and properly have coming from this great committee. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who in this unusual way obtained for the bill its privileged status, in the closing sentence of his address delivered on the floor supporting this bill, announces that those gentlemen in this House and elsewhere who were opposed to this bill and to this kind of policy really stand in the way of the Nation's advance.

He devoted considerable time to discussing the situation in the State of Alabama and regretting that some Canadian company, because we had established no definite water-power policy, found it impossible to locate in Alabama for the purpose of extracting nitrogen from the air in order to use it in the manufacture of fertilizer, but went back to Canada, where he says there is an adequate water-power policy.

If there is anything in Alabama that can be given away by that State to the Water Power Trust and has not been so given away, I would like to know what it is. The policy of the gentleman from Alabama, and those who think with him, has had the effect of delivering the State of Alabama bound hand and foot to the water-power groups in this country. The Alabama Light & Power Co. is a company that he usually champions on this floor. It is the company which attempted to get permission from this Government to build a dam in the Coosa River, and which, in spite of his effort, passed the House by a bare majority and was afterwards vetoed by the President of the United States. The only thing left in Alabama that Alabama has not given away are the possibilities in her navigable rivers, and they seem to be demanding, under the leadership of the distinguished statesman from that State, the right to give these possibilities away also to the great water-power groups. They are not even loyal to the water-power grabbers who operate under the flag of the United States, but seem to prefer capitalists who operate under the English flag.

The stock of the Alabama Light & Power Co. is all owned by the Alabama Traction, Light & Power Co., which is a $30,000,000 corporation organized in Canada. These companies together control the Birmingham & Gulf Power Co. and the Muscle Shoals Co., operating also in Alabama, with an unlimited charter nonforfeitable for nonuse. They can build dams on the Tallapoosa River, build all the electric roads in Alabama they feel like building, and establish as many electric light plants as they may feel like establishing. They are exempt for 10 years from taxation in reference to any plant they may construct. These Canadian companies control in Alabama 400,000 electrical horsepower, developed and undeveloped. Up in the city of Birmingham, where the gentleman lives—the gentleman who is sure we stand in the way of national progress when we propose a rational water-power policy—the American Cities Co. control. This is a company organized for the purpose of controlling the utilities of cities in the South. It seems easier to get franchises in the cities of the South and rights to streets than it now is in northern cities. The American Cities Co. operates principally in the South.

In the city of Birmingham this organization controls the Birmingham Railway, Light & Power Co., which operates all the street railways and the electric light and power companies and the steam-heating business of all the municipalities which compose the present incorporated city of Birmingham. After giving away everything in Birmingham to the American Cities Co., and giving everything that can possibly be given away in the State to the Canadian company which is given such extraordinary powers, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] comes into the House and complains that we have not permitted him and his associates who think as he does in the State of Alabama to give away to another Canadian company the right also to dam the navigable rivers of Alabama. If there is any State in the Union that has absolutely shown its incapacity to govern in the matter of franchises to water power companies it is the State of Alabama. If this Canadian company that proposed to develop atmospheric nitrogen did not locate there, it was because they found the territory completely covered by other Canadian companies, and for that reason they were compelled to go back to Canada. The gentleman announced that their reason for going back was that they had a definite water-power policy in Canada, and therefore they went back there where they could know what they could do. But when they went back to Canada they submitted themselves to a tax on every horsepower of electric energy they could develop. When they went back to Canada they agreed that the Canadian Government could take over at the end of a term of years their entire plant, if they pleased, and pay them what they pleased or pay them nothing. They went to a country that regulates absolutely the price of electrical energy to the consumer. Now that is all the conservationists of this country stand for. That is the only policy we are promoting—tolls to the Government, adequate price regulation for the consumer, and a definite period within which these companies will be permitted to operate under some definite regulation that will give to capital the security it ought to have.

Whenever we adopt in this country the kind of policy the conservationists stand for here and throughout the world, when we adopt the kind of rational policy they have in Sweden and Switzerland, in France, in the Canadian Provinces, wherever among civilized nations it is possible in the world to develop considerable electrical horsepower—when we do that we will be able to attract capital to our rivers, and this bill will absolutely fail to bring about results of that character.

Mr. Chairman, I want now to hold up to this House and to the country a horrible example. I do not like to occupy the rôle of a prophet, but I think I have the right to call attention now to the things that I have been saying for years would happen under the policies, or rather the lack of policies, prevailing in this country with reference to water power. I want to discuss the greatest single devolpment of water power on this continent, accomplished by damming up the greatest river we have—the Mississippi River, at Keokuk, Iowa—building a structure between Keokuk, Iowa, and Hamilton, Ill. This franchise was granted in 1905 to a group of citizens of Keokuk. They had no particular financial standing. The statement was made at the time on this floor that it would cost a million dollars or it might cost $2,000,000 to build this dam; that it was demanded by the people in that immediate neighborhood, and therefore it ought to go through, and there ought to be no opposition to its passage. Finally it was possible to get it through—it was considered by unanimous consent and it passed the House. At that time, and that was only a few years ago, we knew nothing about water power or its possibilities in this country. We did not then know for a certainty that power could be conveyed considerable distances from the point where it was developed without appreciable loss. Four legislative days later, without any hearings, without any consideration, the bill passed the Senate, and the same day it was signed by the President and became a law.

These gentlemen, these citizens of Keokuk and that vicinity, who, upon the theory that they were locally interested, and that it was a local enterprise, and that the people in that vicinity wanted it, were able to obtain the franchise, afterwards sold it, without the prior expenditure of a dollar upon their part, to Mr. Hugh L. Cooper, the gentleman who furnished this committee with its reasons for this bill, and obtained for it $20,000. Mr. Cooper proceeded to capitalize this venture and to place the stock in England. In two or three years the dam was completed. It has been in operation now for over a year. This is the second season. A proper water-power policy, a hydroelectric commission, would have prevented this Mississippi River bubble, and there never was in fact or in fiction a Mississippi River bubble equal to this dam. The Government assigned to the project an engineer and had him live there at Keokuk, to oversee the work, and to see that the rights of the Government were protected. The statement was made, and the Government never contradicted it, that it was possible to develop 300,000 horsepower in this river where the dam was to be built. They went down to St. Louis and contracted to market 60,000 horsepower at a little over a million dollars per year, and then continued their successful efforts to finance the building of this dam. They went abroad and advertised abroad that under the permission we had given them, under the consent we had given them to build this dam, all they had to do was to erect there a plant, and then the Government was compelled to buy the power from them with which to operate the locks, at their own price. This was one of the reasons advanced by them for liberal capitalization; this was one of the reasons why they said the returns would be large.

They also in their advertisements said that they could develop 300,000 horsepower, calling attention always to the fact that there was Government supervision here; that a Government engineer was there to overlook everything, and leading foreign investors to believe that this Government was exercising the kind of supervision over that kind of enterprise that they had a right to believe it would under the evidence. As a matter of fact we exercised not the slightest supervision over this enterprise. We permitted them to go ahead and build this dam just as they pleased, and whenever steamboat companies operating on the river complained about any features of it, the engineers in charge simply said to them—and I have a series of letters bearing out these statements—"We will see what Mr. Cooper will do about it"; and if Mr. Cooper was willing to do what the companies wanted in the interest of navigation, then it was done, and if he was not willing to do it it was not done. That was all there was to it. At the present time they are proposing to issue a little over $4,000,000 of bonds, and when they have done that it will mean that there are $47,000,000 worth of bonds and securities there with which the people within the power zone are to be burdened in order to enable this company to pay dividends and interest. This company has violated every law of the States where it is operating; it has violated the Federal law. In order to facilitate the capitalization of the company they paid dividends on their stock before even the dam was completed, before a wheel was furning. I have here the latest publication issued by the Stone & Wester Co., the holding company which now controls this investment, in which they say that this hydroelectric plant on the Mississippi River starts with an initial capacity of approximately 125,000 delivered horsepower and an ultimate horsepower of approximately 200,000 delivered horsepower.

Mr. MADDEN. What do they mean by "delivered horsepower"?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not think it means anything. I do not know what it means. I know that they can not either produce or deliver it. Here is what the engineers have to say about it in their letter to me of June 13:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, June 13, 1914.

HON. HENRY T. RAINEY,
United States House of Representatives.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 2d instant, requesting information as to the electrical energy that may be developed on the Mississippi River at Keokuk, Iowa, I have the honor to quote for your information from a report on the subject by the district engineer officer at Rock Island, Ill.:

"The average power that can be generated at Keokuk at low water, without impounding the water, is 77,273 horsepower.

"If water is stored at night to the full extent authorized by the War Department, the average low-water output during 10 hours of darkness will be 38,636 horsepower, and the corresponding average output in the daytime will be 104,870 horsepower.

"The output of power is not affected by the river being frozen over."

Very respectfully,

DAN C. KINGMAN,
Chief of Engineers United States Army.

They have obtained from the War Department permission to impound water in the nighttime, which shows the absolute insufficiency of regulation by the War Department. The War Department in water-power matters does not attempt to regulate anything. The Secretary of War gets his advice and information from engineers, and they are always for these power projects and against navigation. They obtained permission from the War Department to impound water there in the nighttime in order to enable this company to develop as much power as possible in the daytime. In other words, in the nighttime they stop the flow of the Mississippi River so that in the daytime they can let it run through, when down in St. Louis they are demanding this power under their contract. We knew nothing about it in this country; we did not hear of it until they advertised in England that the War Department had given them the right to dam up this river almost completely in the nighttime, to stop the flow of the mightiest river on this continent, in order to enable them in the daytime to develop more power.

They do not entirely stop the flow of the Mississippi River in the nighttime, but they might just as well do it. They stop it to such a degree during the hours of darkness that navigation is seriously impaired both in the day and in the night. If they are permitted to continue doing this, they can only develop 104,000 horsepower at that point on the Mississippi River in the daytime. I wrote to every steamboat company authorized to operate boats on the upper river—104 of them altogether—and I have answers from such of them as actually operate boats on the upper river through these locks, or are proposing to operate boats upon this part of the river. There has not been a single boat added to the traffic on the upper river on account of the building of this dam. On the contrary, two or three of them have been taken off. There is not a single steamboat officer or owner operating on this part of the river who does not complain bitterly of the management of this dam. The impounding of the water there in the nighttime very frequently leaves vessels operating on the river below the dam high and dry on the rocks. Is that benefiting the navigation of the river in the slightest degree? They have created slack-water navigation above the dam for a considerable number of miles. They have created there a lake which, in honor of this engineer who furnished the information upon which this bill was constructed, they call Lake Cooper. They have made it difficult, on account of the waves on this lake, for ordinary river steamers to navigate that part of the river in a storm. They had a system of canals there before this dam was built which were ample and sufficient. Only one steamboat owner on the upper river advised me that the dam was satisfactory to him, and upon investigation I found he was engaged in the excursion business, and his business was to collect money from people whom he carried down to Keokuk to look at the dam.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman understand that under the terms of the present bill that like dams could be constructed in navigable streams as the Keokuk Dam?

Mr. RAINEY. I understand under the terms of the present bill before any dam is built they have to get permission from Congress.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. RAINEY. I can say this bill does not change the policy in the least, and if they could do these things in the past, under this bill they can do the same things in the future.

Mr. FOWLER. One other question. If dams like the Keokuk were built numerously on navigable streams what effect, in the gentleman's opinion, would it have on water navigation?

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, it would destroy navigation and be of tremendous benefit to the railroads. Now, this is not all that has been done under the permission of the War Department. They have constructed that dam in such a way that it permits of its being used as a bridge, and without any authority from this Congress at all. They also had no authority to store water in the nighttime. They have no authority at all from any source whatever except the permit given them by the Secretary of War, but they have built two piers in the forebay of that dam upon which they propose to erect some sort of a jackknife bridge in order to operate a bridge across the river at this point. It does not do any good to protest in this matter; the piers are there, and there is no authority for them at all except the authority given by the Secretary of War. Under any administration it seems possible for the engineers of water-power projects in this country to get any sort of authority from the Secretary of War they want to get. There is no supervisory authority in the interest of navigation assumed by the War Department over a river in the matter of structures of this kind. Those piers stand there, the expectation being that at some future time this House may pass a bill to legalize what they have done illegally. I have talked with a good many pilots on the steamers coming down the river in the nighttime and daytime and they say that in the distance these little piers can with difficulty be seen and look like hats floating on the water. They extend clear down into the rock bed of the Mississippi River, a fearful menace to navigation and to human life.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. ADAMSON. I wish to remind the gentleman that the scheme of erecting a bridge at that dam has not yet been legalized.

Mr. RAINEY. I know it has not been.

Mr. ADAMSON. It has not yet passed the committee of which I am chairman.

Mr. RAINEY. I hope it will not pass your committee.

Mr. ADAMSON. It seems to me the prospect is exceedingly remote. I admit the difficulty which the gentleman mentions about the piers, and the chairman of the committe has protested against it.

Mr. RAINEY. I am aware of that.

Mr. ADAMSON. The chairman of the committee intends to have it taken down and arrange waterways so as to make an unobstructed channel there. I wish further to remind the gentleman that the Keokuk dam was not built under the general dam act, but by a special act before that, and one of the objects of this bill, and some of the sections in it, is to get control and regulation of the Keokuk dam, and if this bill is passed it will be thoroughly regulated under law.

Mr. RAINEY. I believe I stated that it was built under a special act and before this general dam law was passed.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon; I was not in at the time, probably.

Mr. RAINEY. This dam was erected under special license granted by Congress, and all other dams in the future will be erected even under this bill as the result of legislation here in the House. The position taken by the chairman of the committee does not satisfy me at all; it may satisfy him, and it may satisfy others. A simple proposition to make this channel a little safer and permit this company to go ahead and build these piers, and in another place——

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman certainly misunderstands me. I do not propose to permit any such thing.

Mr. RAINEY. I thought you were going to insist and announced that the committee policy was going to be that the piers be moved farther east?

Mr. ADAMSON. I say if the War Department will permit them to build a bridge for their own service, and not for the public, they must make a safe channel, even for that, but I do not expect there ever will be authority given to put a public bridge on that dam.

Mr. RAINEY. I am glad the gentleman announced that policy.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. The piers are there now by the authority of the War Department?

Mr. RAINEY. They are.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. And the piers as they are now located interfere more or less with navigation?

Mr. RAINEY. Absolutely. They stand there 175 feet apart, and they do not stand in line. The alignment is different from what it ought to be with reference to boats coming down the river, which makes the distance apart, in fact, much less than it is. They stand there in 40 feet of water, and these frail river steamboats come down loaded sometimes with 800 people, or more even than that—excursionists—whose lives are endangered in the deep water of the fore bay; and the War Department has permitted this condition of affairs.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will permit, while I concur in the views of the gentleman from Illinois and have announced my views to the War Department, I do not wish to do the distinguished engineers of the War Department injustice. They may know more about it than the gentleman from Illinois and I know. I confess I am a "landlubber." As to the position of the War Department on the subject, they insist the channel is safe. I want to do them justice, and I leave it to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], who accompanied me in the inspection of that dam.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. In my own time I will state it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I mean in his own time he will state the position of the War Department about it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It is only fair to state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] that the information obtained by the subcommittee which visited there last winter is entirely different. I do not think one single fact that the gentleman has stated is substantiated by the facts we obtained at Keokuk.

Mr. ADAMSON. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois in what he says as to the location of those piers. If the War Department permits them for the private use of the company itself and not for the public, then I am going to insist on moving the piers and making a special channel. I may stand alone on that.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman need not have anything he says corroborated, so far as I am concerned. I am quite willing to believe that the War Department, following its usual policy, is prepared to say that these piers or anything else water-power promoters want to do in our rivers is all right and does not endanger navigation. I get my information, however, from the companies which operate boats on the river, and information of that character is more valuable than information obtained from water-power promoters, or from officials of the War Department, 1,000 miles from the river. These piers remained for days during the navigation season without any lights on them and without any protection around them in the the way of booms. I have a letter which shows that at the request of the steamboat interests operating on the river the engineer in charge requested Mr. Cooper to put some booms around those piers in order to make them safer, and that Mr. Cooper refused to do it; and I understand that now this Government, at its own expense, within the last month or so, has erected booms around those piers, so illegally placed there, in order to protect, to a certain degree, the lives of the people on the steamboats navigating this river.

Now, there is no difference between us at all. Those piers are 175 feet apart. Every boatman navigating the river at that point, every steamboat man, every officer on a steamboat, and every officer of the company operating those boats will say they are unsafe in their present condition, but from a thousand miles away a chief of engineers finds that they are safe, and the subcommittee of this committee, which went to Keokuk and consulted only interested citizens, obtained information, of course, that everything was all right.

They have insidious ways of overcoming the opposition of engineers to what they do. I may later on refer to some of them. They placed in charge of the navigation interests on the river an engineer, and he stays there at Keokuk a part of the time at least. He has just returned from a trip of several hundred miles over the rivers of that part of the country on a palatial power boat owned by the Mississippi River Power Co., which he made as the guest of the company. I get this information from the newspapers published in that section. You can not expect an official who accepts favors of this kind to discharge the duties of his office in an entirely satisfactory way; he is not in a position to do it. His only business seems to be to act as an ambassador between the boats navigating that river below the dam, and the officials of this English water-power company. Whenever it is found that there is not enough water to get up to the dam the boat ties up and one of the officers goes to some farmhouse and telephones up to the engineer in charge, and he, acting as an ambassador, proceeds to the persons in charge of the dam and asks them to let down enough water to make the river navigable; sometimes they do and sometimes they do not, but the boats finally are able to reach the dam. Has that kind of structure under those regulations proven of any benefit to the Mississippi River at that point?

This dam was built on the theory that they were going to get cheap water power in that section of Illinois. The company obtaining the franchise sold it to Mr. Cooper for $20,000. He sold it to the Mississippi Power Co., and that company built the dam. How much it really cost, I do not know. I know how much securities were charged against it. They claim it cost over $30,000,000, and they have standing out now over $43,000,000 worth of stock and securities, on which they expect to pay dividends and interest. The Mississippi River Power Co. expect to sell nearly all their power in this way: They organized the Mississippi River Power Co. and built the dam. They sell 60,000 horsepower to the Mississippi River Power Distributing Co., a subsidiary company of the Mississippi River Power Co. The Mississippi Power Distributing Co. disposes of the 60,000 horsepower in the following manner: In the first place, however, the Mississippi River Power Co. carries the power to within 6 miles of St. Louis, and they there turn it over to this subsidiary company, and that company puts in transformers and carries it to St. Louis, and they sell this entire amount of power in St. Louis to the United Railways Co., of St. Louis, and the Union Electric & Power Co., of St. Louis. The United Railways Co., of St. Louis, is the company that controls street-car franchises in St. Louis and operates over 100 miles of street cars. The Union Electric & Power Co., of St. Louis, is the company that has heretofore generated power from steam in St. Louis and distributed it throughout the city. They sell to those two companies, and both of those companies are controlled by the North American Co., and the North American Co. owns a large block of stock in the Mississippi River Power Co. Now, how does that do anybody any good? This is what has been accomplished: They are selling to the Union Electric & Power Co., and the Union Electric & Power Co. is selling the electric energy there in St. Louis at the price at which it has always sold electric energy. They have accomplished with this company, controlled as it is by the Mississippi River Co. and the North American Co., an arrangement by which the United Railways Co., of St. Louis, for 99 years will be furnished with electric energy and power regulated only by the price of steam.

Now, for 99 years, if you can not control that sort of a thing—and I do not know how you can control it under this bill, or under anything else that this committee has ever proposed—for 99 years the hope for cheaper street car fares in the city of St. Louis is gone. Cities located along the line of this transmission line [indicating], this high-traction line that connects the dam with St. Louis, can not get any power. They can not connect up with that line, so conveying power of high voltage, any more than they can connect up with the moon, and they do not try to do it.

I have in my possession a series of letters which passed between representatives of the Mississippi River Power Co. and one of the larger cities in Illinois, in which the representatives of the Mississippi Power Co. in effect say: "We will sell you power in your city, we will come to your city with our power, if you will turn over to us all your public utilities." They made that sort of a proposition on a misunderstanding, and when they found out what the facts were in that city they withdrew even that sort of a proposition.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. I would like to ask the gentleman if the stockholders in the North American Co., any of them, are directors in the Mississippi River Power Co.?

Mr. RAINEY. I could not answer that question; but I know that the North American Co. owns a large block of the stock in the Mississippi River Power Co., and they act in harmony and are controlled by the same interests. They accomplish this sort of thing by a common ownership of stock arrangement.

I do not want to keep the committee listening to me too long this hot day, but I want to call attention to the possibilities in that section or any other section of the country where you permit water-power development under an insufficient bill, like the bills that we have always had, and like this one.

I want to state some facts concerning the situation there in that section of the United States and to call attention to what may happen if this bill becomes a law.

Three of the great power groups of the country are the Stone & Webster group, the Middle West Utilities Co., and the North American Co.

The Stone & Webster people control now the Keokuk Dam; they control or own 52 companies in various parts of the country operating street railways, electric light, gas, and power companies. A conservative estimate of the population of the territory served by the utilities of this interest is 3,398,650.

The Middle West Utilities Co. is a $24,000,000 corporation, organized for the purpose particularly of controlling the public utilities in the smaller cities and towns. I might call attention to one of its subsidiary companies, the Central Illinois Public Service Co. It has already taken over about 100 utilities in as many communities in central, southern, and western Illinois. A large number of generating plants formerly supplied this district. These plants are being shut down, and within a short time all these cities will be served by the transmission lines of this company.

The North American Co. is another great holding company. It controls the entire electric light and industrial power business of Detroit. It controls the St. Louis Gas Co., which does the entire business of St. Louis County, Mo., and serves 26 cities and towns. It controls also the Union Electric Light Co., which does the greater part of the electric light and power business of St. Louis. It controls the United Railways Co. of St. Louis; it also controls large public-service properties in other cities.

I want to show what is going on in that section of the country. The Middle West Utilities Co. controls large amounts of coal lands in Illinois. I desire to call attention to the map I have displayed on the easel here to make my position plain.

At Kincaid, Ill., in one of the greatest bituminous-coal regions in Illinois, and perhaps in the world, they have erected a plant to generate electricity from coal. Over at Hull, Ill., along the transmission line of the Mississippi River Power Co., is a substation of that company. Here go the power lines of the Mississippi River Power Co., down to a point above St. Louis, where they cross over to Missouri. At Hull, Ill., they have put in transformers, and down here, again, at Meppin, Ill., they put in transformers in order to take electrical energy from that high-voltage line and sell it to somebody else. I will tell you to whom they sell it.

The Middle West Utilities Co. was proclaimed through newspaper press agencies—and these companies have the most skillful press agencies in the world—as an opponent of the Keokuk Dam proposition. The announcement was made that it was being organized for the purpose of competing with the Keokuk Dam. This is the way they compete: They generate power from coal, and then, through some subsidiary company—at present I shall refer only to the Central Illinois Public Service Co.—they buy out plants. They bought a plant a few months ago that had been offered for $4,500, and they paid $20,000 for it. They pay anything that is asked, and just as soon as this Central Illinois Public Service Co. gets control of a local plant in a town they close up the plant and supply the town with electricity generated from coal or electricity generated here at the Stone & Webster plant on the Mississippi River, and they are proceeding to close plants all over central Illinois.

That is a particularly prosperous section of the country, where communities have everything that contributes to the comfort of the people who live there. A number of these towns are supplied with heating plants, and the stores and residences in the towns are heated with waste steam from their little local plants. They will be deprived of that service now. They are given exactly the same rates. As the franchises they buy expire they demand 20-year franchises, and even longer contracts than that. If complaint is made they say, "If you do not like it, go ahead and build your own plants." Most of these cities are bonded as much as they can be under the law, and although they are able to raise a few thousand dollars of local capital, they are not going to raise it and build a plant there and compete with this great combination, and they do not do it. In some places they apparently slightly reduce the rates, but the meters are always in some mysterious way speeded up and the customer never can tell from the bills he pays that there is any reduction.

Now, through all these cities in central Illinois, which I have indicated here by these red crosses, the service lines of the Central Illinois Service Co. reach. They reach them all. They connect up over here with the Keokuk Dam at Hull, Ill. They connect down here again with the Keokuk Dam at Meppen, Ill. They connect up with the great coal fields there, controlled by the Middle West Utilities Co., and they get from those sources—the coal fields of Illinois and this great national river of ours—all the power that is available in any of those cities, and they sell it to them, whether it comes from coal or whether it comes from the power generated there in the river, at the price they see fit to make.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Would not the public utilities commission of our State have the power to regulate the prices to be charged by these different concerns?

Mr. RAINEY. I presume they could, but they would not control or regulate the price to be charged to the consumers or fix a price that would yield less revenue than these promoters claim they ought to have on $47,000,000 worth of securities.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that they sell power generated at Kincaid for the same price that they sell the power generated on the river?

Mr. RAINEY. Certainly. The company gets the power from both sources. The lines of the Middle West Utilities Co. reach the river and the coal fields, and they get the power from both sources and sell it all through central Illinois, and there is not a particle of competition about it and never can be.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Do you think if the regulation of the rates was turned over to the Secretary of War it would help the interior of Illinois?

Mr. RAINEY. It might be better; it could not be worse.

Mr. FOWLER. Have you any comparative data as to the cost of horsepower generated by water and by coal?

Mr. RAINEY. There is much data available along that line.

Mr. FOWLER. Which is the cheaper?

Mr. RAINEY. Of course, water power is much cheaper.

Mr. FOWLER. Suppose that a few corporations should get control of the water power, who could compete with them in furnishing energy for the purpose of furnishing light?

Mr. RAINEY. There would not be any competition at all.

Mr. FOWLER. When would the Nation ever get rid of such a class of men?

Mr. RAINEY. They can not get rid of such a situation under any policy proposed in this bill.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I understood one of the gentleman's colleagues to ask if this utilities commission in Illinois could not regulate the price at which the hydroelectric power was sold in various cities of Illinois. If this power is produced at Keokuk, beyond the limits of the State of Illinois, would the Illinois commission or any Illinois State authority have the right to regulate it?

Mr. RAINEY. They would have great difficulty in doing it, and that is the point I am coming to now. This bill proposes that the Secretary of War shall control the price of certain power.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARNER). The gentleman from Illinois has consumed one hour.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I understood the gentleman was to have all the time he desired.

Mr. GARNER. The present occupant of the chair was advised that the gentleman was to use not to exceed one hour.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] took the floor he was yielded such time as he might desire.

Mr. BURNETT. That was distinctly stated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will make this statement: The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] has been accustomed to yield to gentlemen and then send word to the Chair that they may proceed not beyond a certain time, and in this instance the gentleman from Georgia sent word to the occupant of the chair not to let the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] proceed to exceed one hour. That is the reason the Chair called attention to the expiration of the time.

Mr. RAINEY. On account of the interruptions to which I have yielded, I think the gentleman from Georgia, if he were on the floor at this moment, would allow me more time.

Mr. MANN. In this case the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] yielded to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] until he should have concluded his remarks.

Mr. RAINEY. I said to the gentleman from Georgia that I would conclude within one hour.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. RAINEY. I will conclude in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. It is proposed in this bill that the Secretary of War shall regulate such current as goes into interstate commerce, provided the State where the current is sold has no adequate method of regulating cost to consumers. I do not know what sort of a tribunal is to determine whether the method is adequate or not.

This bill permits interchanges of current between plants located in different places, and under this arrangement the consumer can not tell where he gets his power. It moves unseen over wires across the boundaries of States. How does he know whether it is interstate power or not? How does anybody know, except probably some of the officials of these companies; and how is the individual consumer going to find out where he gets his power in order to come here individually and complain to the Secretary of War? I do not think you can possibly regulate the price in that way.

But suppose those three States out there attempt to regulate the price of this power. Suppose Illinois says, "You can sell power in Illinois for $17 a horsepower"; and Iowa says, "You can sell power for $18 a horsepower"; and Missouri says, "You can sell power for $19 a horsepower"; what State will get it? Why, the State that will permit them to charge the most. It is not a question as to who will pay the least under this bill, it is a question as to who will pay the most, and that is the only competition provided for in this bill.

Now, I want to be fair. I do not think it is possible to establish competition between water-power plants, and I know it is not possible to establish competition between the plants operating here on this river and plants operating in this coal field. You can not do it. There is no use trying. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] occupied most of his time in discussing the question as to whether or not you could make water-power groups compete. He quoted a number of water conservation advocates on that subject, and they all said consolidation was desirable; and of course it is. These things are natural monopolies. That situation in Illinois is ideal. Here is a river over here that may sometimes be in flood and sometimes frozen almost solid. The varying power which it can deliver is sometimes larger, sometimes much smaller. Here is an auxiliary plant over here in the coal fields, ready at any time to supply the lack of power which they can not supply at Keokuk. They ought not to compete, in order to render the best service. They ought to be regulated in some adequate way, but this bill does not propose that sort of a way.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. For just one question. I must conclude my remarks.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Does this bill propose to allow the States to regulate the charges, or are the charges to be regulated by the War Department?

Mr. RAINEY. This bill only regulates currents that are in interstate use, sold in another State than the one in which they are generated; and the bill does not attempt to regulate them there if that State has adopted an adequate method of controlling the price of the power that may be supplied from this particular plant, and nobody knows how you are going to decide what is adequate.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. One other question. Is it proposed by this bill that the different States shall not establish different rates, and therefore permit discrimination?

Mr. RAINEY. The bill provides that the Secretary of War may intervene to prevent discrimination. That part of the bill is not at all plain to me. He may intervene to compel them to raise their rates. I do not think, however, under this bill he could in fact exercise any power at all. Now, if we could establish in this country an extension of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to be known as the hydroelectric division of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to regulate this entire thing, including the issue of stock and bonds, we would not have this Mississippi bubble up here.

Why, we have done more harm to hydroelectric development in this country by permitting these fellows who have been kiting that stock and those bonds and proposing to offer to the public $47,000,000 worth of it—we have done more harm to hydroelectric development than we could possibly do in any other way. But if we had a hydroelectric commission to give out the facts in the case, to have said at the outset that you can not develop more than 77,000 horsepower, it would prevent this situation. The Secretary of War knows how much can be produced there. I have his letter here. The Secretary of War says that even if they are permitted to impound the water in the nighttime, if that method is to continue, they could not get more than 104,000 horsepower, and yet they have offered and sold their stock on a basis of 300,000 horsepower, and now they say they can develop 200,000 horsepower. They have made investors throughout the world believe that, and they never could do it and never will be able to do it. If we had a hydroelectric commission in this country controlling this thing, it would relieve capital of the uncertainty which surrounds the present way of doing business in the Congress. We must give capital a definite period during which it will be permitted to operate these plants. We must protect investors by telling them how much power can be developed and where it can be marketed, and not leave them, under supposed Government supervision, to the tender mercies of such unscrupulous manipulators as these Keokuk Dam people have proven themselves to be. We must also protect consumers and see that the prices charged them are reasonable. We should provide a suitable compensation for the Government; that compensation every Government in the world exacts. When we do all this we will have here real hydroelectric development.

There has been introduced by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] a bill, which has been referred to the Ways and Means Committee, placing a tax of so much per horsepower on the power produced in the rivers of this country, one-fifth of $1 per horsepower. That must be a joke. It appears as a joke to me. Here is a company operating in a community supplying them with power generated from a dam in a river. Here is another company supplying the same community with power generated from coal. Here is another company supplying power generated from coal and from falling water combined. The three companies operate in the same community, deriving their power in these three different ways and selling the power at approximately the same price. Can we tax one of these companies because it is generating power from a dam in a river and not tax the others? Could we sustain a bill of that kind under the Constitution of the United States? That is class legislation undreamed of before in the history of the courts of this country. Of course it could not be done. The only way in which you will be able to get any return from these rivers is to make a part of the condition of consent the proposition that they shall pay so much per horsepower, to make that a part of the contract, and then the constitutional question does not come in and they will be compelled to pay as they have to pay everywhere else.

Now, I do not desire to take up any more time unless some Member of the House wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. BOOHER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I do not understand why anybody should want competition on the Keokuk dam, because the producing company is the same company in reality that uses it. What is the use of competition?

Mr. RAINEY. Of course, there can be no competition and there is no competition.

Mr. BOOHER. Can not you have a public utilities commission of Illinois regulate the price in Illinois? Can not they do it without reference to the Secretary of War or anybody else?

Mr. RAINEY. They might be able to do it, but if they fix a price so low that this company operating at Keokuk did not want to sell, they would go into another State and sell where they were permitted to charge a higher price. They would sell in the State that permitted them to charge the highest price. That is what would happen anywhere, because you can carry electrical power a great distance and market it in other States.

Mr. O'HAIR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Certainly.

Mr. O'HAIR. Suppose the bill provided for a hydroelectric commission, with powers analogous to the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to control the price to be charged for power originating in any navigable stream, what would the gentleman say as to the advisability of passing the bill substantially as it is?

Mr. RAINEY. That is the idea I suggested. It is not a new method; it is not an experiment. The idea is not original with me. It is the plan used in other civilized nations of the world where there is great power produced in rivers. In all other countries these things are all controlled by commissions selected by the Government; in other countries they pay tolls and charge consumers what the commission says they can charge. I think that is the better policy. This bill will not settle anything. It simply postpones the agitation in this country until some day when we can have an adequate policy. The policy announced in this bill will not attract capital to our rivers.

Mr. BURNETT. Does the gentleman think the commission should regulate intrastate as well as interstate power?

Mr. RAINEY. It should regulate all power produced anywhere in a navigable river or in a Government-controlled river, and should be strictly nonpartisan. There is no navigable river in the country where you can generate power but that is not also, in a sense, interstate; at any rate, it is subject to the control of the National Government to its source whether navigable all the way or not. There is not a drop of water that falls on the mountain headlands that does not reach the sea by that river or some other. It either reaches the sea by that river or it is connected with some other river in the country, and so reaches the sea. There is nothing in our navigable rivers that this Government could not control. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MONTAGUE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 12579) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, Nos. 23, 37, 81, 139, and 155, recedes from its amendment No. 82, had asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ASHURST, Mr. LANE, and Mr. CLAPP as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE GENERAL DAM ACT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman from Georgia use some of his time?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] 30 minutes.

[Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota rose.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] wanted a moment, if the gentleman from Minnesota will permit.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, yesterday, when the general deficiency bill was before the House, I made a statement with reference to Senate amendment numbered 158, in which I stated that there was no statute of limitations which barred officers of the Union Army going before the comptroller and having their longevity claims adjusted, and that the amendment only put those officers in the Confederate Army on the same basis. I had not investigated that question personally, but had received my information from Mr. Whiteley, of the firm of Herbert & Micou; and after the House adjourned I called upon Mr. Whiteley to substantiate what he told me. He has written me a letter, substantiating the facts that I stated and referring to the documents and the pages to prove the facts as stated.

I therefore rose to take advantage of the leave to print, that was granted in connection with the general debate under this bill, in order to have this letter printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks yesterday.

Following is the letter referred to:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 24, 1914.

Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. UNDERWOOD: Referring to amendment No. 158, added to the general deficiency bill, now pending, by the Senate, and as to which amendment I gave you certain information, I note in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday that the statements as to law and fact made by you were contradicted by certain gentlemen opposing the amendment, and I will take the liberty of writing you now to clear up the misunderstanding under which these gentlemen unquestionably proceeded. In order to do so I will first briefly give the status of these so-called longevity claims which have arisen under the act of Congress of 1838.

In that year Congress provided that all officers of the Army should receive an increase in pay (which consisted of an additional ration per day or its commuted value) for each period of five years' service in the Army. This legislation was limited to the Army, and so no similar longevity claims as to officers of the Navy have arisen during the period in question. The pay and accounting officers of the Government in construing this act of Congress decided that service in the Army began with the date of graduation. In 1884 the Supreme Court, in the case of United States v. Morton (112 U. S., 1), decided that the time of service of a cadet at the Military Academy was to be regarded as actual time of service in the Army within the meaning of the acts of February 24, 1881, and June 30, 1882 (21 Stat. L., 346; 22 Stat. L., 118), in computing his increase of pay for each term of five years' service under the pay law of 1870, which law changed the act of 1838, which gave a ration for each five years' service, and gave a 10 per cent increase for each five years' service up to 40 per cent. In 1889, in the case of United States v. Watson (130 U. S., 80), the Supreme Court further decided that the time of service of a cadet in the Military Academy at West Point was to be regarded as part of the time he served in the Army, within the meaning of the act of July 5, 1838, and should be counted in computing his longevity pay under that act; further deciding that an officer was entitled to receive from the courts so much of the amount thereon thus computed not barred by the statute of limitations.

This was the first construction of the Supreme Court upon the act of 1838, and under it all officers of the Army became entitled to receive immediately from the pay officers this longevity pay under the act of 1838 for six years prior to the time that the Watson case, the test case, had been filed in the Court of Claims. All of the officers in the United States Army, or their heirs, except the officers who had resigned and joined the Confederacy and who were barred by section 3480, Revised Statutes, from presenting their claims, received their longevity pay back to 1880 under this decision of the Supreme Court. Prior to 1880 they could not receive the said longevity pay from the courts, although the Supreme Court held them to be entitled to it under the act of 1838, because of the six-year period of limitation which runs against all claims against the United States in United States courts.

There was, however, a way in which these claims could be settled and paid, and that was through the accounting officers, where no statute of limitations runs against the claim of any officer of the Army or Navy or his heirs. See the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury in the case of Alexander O. Brodie (14 Compt. Dec., 795), rendered in 1908, in which the comptroller states:

"There is no statute of limitations that bars the claimant's right to recover before the accounting officers upon his claim in this case. Were it not for the bar of the statute of limitations against his right to sue in the Court of Claims, and he should sue there, there can be no doubt but that under the act of 1838 he would recover, and that being true, I do not think the accounting officers against whom the bar of the statute of limitations does not apply are justified in disallowing his claim under said act."

See also Smith v. United States (14 C. Cls., 114), in which the court held:

"Accounts in the Treasury are never closed. In neither the legal nor mercantile sense of the term is an account between the Government and one of its officers ever 'finally adjusted' nor his official bond ever canceled or surrendered. This practice is general, has been invariable since the organization of the Treasury, and is applicable to all officers as well as those intrusted with the disbursement of the public funds."

Because there was no statute of limitations barring the payment of these longevity claims prior to 1880 by the accounting officers, officers of the United States Army filed with the accounting officers immediately after the Watson decision in 1889 claims for longevity prior to 1880. The comptroller in office, Mr. Butler, allowed the claims and paid longevity for this service from the date of their graduation to the family of Gen. U. S. Grant, to Gen. William S. Rosecrans (who was then still living), and to the family of Gen. Judson Kilpatrick. Gen. Grant's heirs were paid longevity under the act of 1838, by Comptroller Butler, from 1844 to 1880. Gen. Rosecrans was paid longevity from 1843 to 1880, and Gen. Kilpatrick's family were paid longevity from 1862 to the time of his resignation.

After the payment of these claims there was a change of comptrollers, and the new comptroller, Mr. Gilkeson, reversing his predecessor, Mr. Butler, and in effect overruling the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, refused to pay any more longevity claims prior to 1880. Since the claims prior to that time were barred in the courts by the statute of limitations, the comptroller was the only one who could allow and pay them, except, of course, Congress, and under Comptroller Gilkeson's refusal to pay, no further longevity claims of northern officers accruing prior to 1880 were paid until 1908.

In 1908 another comptroller, Mr. Mitchell, reversed Comptroller Gilkeson's decision, holding that the accounting officers should never have attempted to overrule the Supreme Court of the United States, decided that the longevity between 1838 and 1880 should be paid. In this decision (14 Compt. Dec., 795), case of Alexander O. Brodie, the comptroller states:

"The asserted doctrine that because the construction placed upon the act of 1838 by the accounting officers prevailed for a long period of time such construction should be persisted in, notwithstanding the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court had decided that such construction was wrong and contrary to law, I do not think can be sanctioned. To do so is to perpetuate error, overthrow the law, and deny to a worthy class of men the rights which the law clearly gives to them. In other words, the Supreme Court of the United States being the ultimate tribunal to determine the meaning of statutes enacted by Congress, the accounting officers are not justified in setting up their judgment in conflict with the decision of the Supreme Court in such cases upon the assumption that such decision is unreasonable or because it is in conflict with a long-standing practice of the accounting officers."

This decision, however, was qualified by the rule which prevails before the comptroller, that accounting officers are not authorized to reopen accounts settled by their predecessors except for the purpose of correcting mistakes of fact arising from errors in calculation, or upon the production of newly discovered material evidence, or for fraud. (See decision of comptroller, 14 Compt. Dec., 804.)

The effect of this exception was that all northern officers who had, after the payment of the claims of Grant, Rosecrans, and Kilpatrick for longevity between 1838 and 1880, presented their claims for the same pay and had them disallowed by Comptroller Gilkeson were now barred from presenting their claims to Comptroller Mitchell under his decision of 1908, reversing Gilkeson.

However, all northern officers of the United States Army or their heirs who had not, because of notice of Gilkeson's action, presented their claims and had them disallowed were able to and did present them to Comptroller Mitchell, had them audited, certified to Congress by the Treasury, and paid on every general deficiency bill since 1908.

As you stated upon the floor of the House yesterday, about a million dollars have been paid since 1908 to these northern officers or their heirs for longevity between 1838 and 1880. Every cent of this sum is for longevity prior to 1880, because all longevity after that had been settled by the pay officers under the Watson decision in 1889.

In order that there may be no doubt about the correctness of this statement and the statement made by you, I herewith refer to the documents containing the certified claims for longevity between 1838 and 1880 allowed by the Auditor of the War Department, certified to Congress, and paid as follows:

Number of claims.	Amount.	Certified in—	Paid in act of—
19	$9,257.44	H. Doc. 1414, 60th Cong., 2d sess.	Mar. 4, 1909

3	1,412.54	S. Doc. 443, 63d Cong., 2d sess.

All of the claims thus listed and the amounts paid thereon are the claims of officers of the Northern Army for longevity between 1838 and 1880. This can be verified by an examination of the names of the officers contained in the House and Senate documents stated in Heitman's Historical Register and Dictionary of the United States Army, 1789 to 1903, volume 1. In this register it will be seen that all of the names which I have checked off in the documents I am transmitting to you herewith are graduates of the Military Academy at West Point; and the amounts certified up and paid as stated above were longevity pay prior to 1880, which can be verified by the Office of the Auditor for the War Department. In other words, since 1908, 991 northern officers, or their heirs, have received, according to the documents cited above, $845,737.27, being back longevity pay between 1838 and 1880. This is the same period covered by the claims contained in Senate amendment No. 158, for exactly the same services, rendered at exactly the same time.

A statement was made on the floor yesterday that this sum of approximately a million dollars was collected only for the six-year period where the statute of limitations did not bar them just prior to the decisions of the Supreme Court in the Watson case. This was an error. All claims for that period were paid in 1889 or 1890, and every claim listed above is a claim of a northern officer for longevity pay prior to 1880 and extending back in many cases as far as 1838.

The misunderstanding under which this statement was made was due to the fact that those northern officers whose claims were disallowed by Gilkeson, and who could not therefore have them audited and paid now by the accounting officers under the ruling of res adjudicata, have no recourse save to Congress, and bills to pay their longevity claims have been pending, and amounts have been included by the Senate in a recent omnibus claims bill; but every dollar of the $845,000 set out above is longevity pay accruing between 1838 and 1880, and paid since 1908 to northern officers or their heirs.

The further statement was made that section 3480 did not prevent Confederate officers or their heirs from presenting their claims to the accounting officers, and that it was the statute of limitations that prevented their consideration and adjustment. This statement is also incorrect, as the statute of limitations does not run before the accounting officers, as shown above. It does run before the courts, so that the only opportunity for the presentation and settlement of the claims covered by amendment 158 is with the accounting officers, who were barred from considering them by section 3480, passed in 1867, during reconstruction days. That this is so is established by the recent decision of the comptroller, dated June 29, 1910, in the case of Mansfield Lovell. This officer had graduated from West Point July 1, 1842, and resigned December 18, 1854. He served as a major general in the Confederacy, and died June 1, 1884. His claim was presented to the auditor in 1909 or 1910, under the decision of the comptroller opening these longevity claims in 1908, and a settlement was made in his favor of $819.32, the fact of his service in the Confederacy not having been brought to the attention of the auditor. This sum of $819.32 was certified up to Congress for appropriation in the general deficiency bill (see H. Doc. No. 926, 61st Cong., 2d sess., number of certificate or claim 51040), and after the amount had been so certified the auditor discovered that Mansfield Lovell had served in the Confederate Army, and so informed the comptroller. In the comptroller's decision, cited above, he stated:

"As this claim accrued prior to April 13, 1861, the term fixed in the above statute (sec. 3480), it is unlawful under the terms of the statute for any officer to pay the same. You were without jurisdiction to make either an allowance or disallowance of the claim. You should have dismissed the claim for want of jurisdiction. As you were without jurisdiction, this office is also without jurisdiction to consider the claim upon its merits. Your action is annulled, the claim is dismissed, and the cancellation by you of your certificate is directed. See Hart v. United States (16 C. Cls., 459; 118 U. S., 62; 5 Comp. Dec., 1; letter of Nov. 13, 1909, addressed to you)."

From this it clearly appears that it has been section 3480 that has prevented these Confederate officers or their heirs from coming before the accounting officers since the reopening of these longevity claims in 1908 and having them settled and paid just as the 991 Northern officers have done, as the Confederate officers were not barred by Gilkeson's decision. This for the reason that the Supreme Court's decision allowing credit for service at West Point under the act of 1838 was not rendered until 1889, at which time the first longevity claims under said act were paid by the accounting officers. This was 22 years after the enactment of the prohibitory provision in section 3480, preventing the accounting officers from considering the claims of persons who afterwards aided or abetted the Confederacy in any way. The repeal of section 3480 will enable the 173 Confederate officers or their heirs to file their claims and to receive the same consideration at the hands of the accounting officers and Congress that the 991 Northern officers have already received.

As a concrete illustration of the claims that have been audited and paid by Congress since 1908, I beg to refer to one that was certified during the present session of Congress, March 9, 1914, and appropriated for in the urgent deficiency bill within the past few months.

The claim is that of Edgar O'Connor, who graduated from West Point in 1854 and was killed in battle August 28 1862, so that the period of his claim for longevity was from 1854 to 1862. The heirs of this officer have received the sum of $394.54, allowed during the present year.

Another claim appropriated for in the same urgent deficiency bill was that of Samuel MacKenzie, who graduated from West Point in 1818 and died October 19, 1847. His heirs have received the sum of $644.40 longevity pay for the period between 1818 and 1847. This is the same period covered by the Confederate claims in amendment 158.

In conclusion, you can classify these claims, in just a few words, into three classes.

First. Those of the northern officers, which have been audited and paid since 1908, for longevity pay between 1838 and 1880, and which constitute the bulk of the longevity claims, amounting to about 1,000 claimants.

Second. Those of the Confederate officers, 173 in number, covered by amendment 158, which are in exactly the same status as the northern claims in class 1 except that they have been heretofore barred by section 3480, but which can now be presented and audited just as the 1,000 northern claims have been.

Third. The remainder of the northern claims, which were presented to Comptroller Gilkeson and disallowed and are now barred from consideration by the accounting officers for that reason.

Trusting that this information will clear up the misunderstanding upon the question of these claims, I am,

Very truly, yours,

RICHARD P. WHITELEY.

LONGEVITY PAY.

The annexed list shows the claims of 1,106 officers of the Army whose claims for longevity pay, aggregating $944,950.89, have been allowed, certified to Congress, and paid within the past six years, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in United States v. Watson (130 U. S., 80), and the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury, dated May 18, 1908, in the case of Alexander O. Brodie (14 Comp. Dec., 795).

These claims were regularly audited by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department and reported to Congress in the documents mentioned and appropriated for in the following deficiency acts: Act of March 4, 1909 (35 Stat. L., 939, 944); act of February 25, 1910 (36 Stat. L., 219, 225); act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat L., 808, 813); act of March 4, 1911 (36 Stat. L., 1320, 1325); act of August 26, 1912 (37 Stat. L., 618, 623); act of March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. L., 934).

In the tabular statement following is the date when the officer completed his service at West Point, or graduated. On the list are some claims which are not based upon cadet credit, but upon credit upon service as an enlisted man. Notation has been made to this effect opposite such names.

Longevity claims of Army officers allowed by the accounting officers and appropriated for by Congress (see following documents: S. No. 746, H. R. No. 1414, 60th Cong., 2d sess.; S. Nos. 333, 640, H. Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Chair to notify me when I have used 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is evident from this debate that there are widespread differences of opinion and radically divergent points of view as to what should be done by Congress concerning water-power development. In the preparation of this legislation your committee has not sought to follow either school or adopt either set of theories.

On the one hand, there is the extreme school of so-called conservationists, who believe that rules should be laid down, as they state, for the conservation of the national resources; that there should be regulations prescribed by Congress to govern such development for future generations of our people; and if the resources of the country can not be developed at this time in accordance with those rules, if they should be found to be too restrictive or burdensome for the practical use of the present generation, then so much the worse for the development. That is the extreme view of the conservationists as it is being illustrated by the debate upon this bill.

On the other hand are the extreme views of those who believe that the development should be had at all hazards, irrespective of public interests or public rights; that the greatest public duty we can perform is to encourage the use of our natural resources on any terms which will make them immediately available, letting the public interest care for itself. This committee has not followed that view. What we have sincerely sought to do is to have a proper development in due time for the public advantage of a great national resource, conserving the interests of the people at every step, so that their rights now and for all future generations shall be suitably guarded, that the fullest benefits may be enjoyed by us and by those who will come after us.

Now, we realize that we are criticized from both sides by both sets of extremists, and perhaps that may be regarded as a compliment for what we have actually placed before you. What I now shall attempt to do, after stating briefly the history of this legislation, will be to analyze the bill as well as I can for the committee and show how we have sincerely tried to cause a development of the public resources and at the same time to practically conserve the public interests.

HISTORY OF LEGISLATION.

None of the gentlemen who have spoken have stated accurately the history of this legislation. For many years Congress passed various private bills containing different provisions concerning the authorization for the construction of dams in navigable streams. This was a waste of time and gave no accurate information or proper standard for our action. So for several years it was evident that there should be some method, some uniform system, adopted to define the rights of the owners of the dam and power, and to define and safeguard the interests of the public. Accordingly, in 1906, under the leadership of the present minority leader of the House [Mr. MANN], the first general dam bill was passed, approved June 21, 1906. As we now look back through these years, I sincerely believe that if the President of the United States and the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers then had performed their full duty under the act of 1906, nine-tenths of these disputes would have been settled, the public rights would have been amply protected, and there would have been a large development of our water resources. I think they did not construe that act as liberally and broadly as they could have done and should have done, to have avoided some of these troubles. They could have incorporated among the stipulations and conditions some of the safeguards since demanded by the public, but they did not do so. Accordingly, in 1908, President Roosevelt vetoed two bills authorizing construction of dams in navigable streams. It so happened that the first one came from the State which I have the honor in part to represent, relating to the Rainy River, in district. I knew none of the parties, so that I was entirely disinterested, had no local pressure or sentiment, and I only acted as I believed to be best from the broadest public interest.

RAINY RIVER DAM.

It so happened that I was a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce which had charge of that subject. So it became my duty to interview President Roosevelt at that time and obtain some sort of a compromise, so that that bill could be passed and a tremendous injury prevented to the people of that northern part of the State. President Roosevelt realized the injury when the facts were presented to him. He appreciated that a great injustice would be done; and as I ever found him, during his career, ready to remedy any wrong or injustice when it was shown to him, so he consented that the bill be passed over his veto. It was passed over his veto only because he consented to it. He consented on the basis that there should be a revision of the general dam act, which should go as far as possible in containing the principles which he outlined in his veto messages. Accordingly, Secretary Garfield, of his Cabinet, came before our Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, made his statement to this effect, and those hearings are in print and available for use. A letter was also written by Secretary Garfield to me upon the basis of which the Rainy River bill was passed over President Roosevelt's veto. That letter contains the statement that an amendment to the general dam act would be passed to supplement the existing law and cover whatever deficiencies we could. It can be found in the files of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and in numerous publications of the Senate and House, on the subject of water-power legislation.

I promised that, so far as lay within me, such amendment should be made. The bill which passed, the act of June 23, 1910, redeemed that promise as best we could under the difficulties we had at that time. I had the responsibility of preparing and pressing the legislation and compromising the great differences of opinion on that subject. What we did was necessarily a compromise. The Senate had decided views adverse to those entertained by President Roosevelt and by the extreme conservationists. Many Members of this House had decided views on all phases of the subject. The President and Secretary of War then had decided views and were in a situation to make them effective.

So the act of 1910 was not satisfactory at the time and never has been satisfactory since. There has been very little development under it, and such situation has not been the fault of the law as much as the violent disagreements as to policies and principles outside of that law, which prevented the enactment of the separate bills for the different projects to make the law effective. But that the act was not thoroughly satisfactory is best shown by the fact that since January 1, 1911, only five permits have been granted by the Secretary of War to construct dams on streams wholly intrastate, which would not require any action by Congress. Two in Minnesota, one in Oklahoma, one in West Virginia, and one in Wisconsin are all the applications and permits under this provision. So it is evident that greedy water-power interests have not profited any by the provisions of that act. As a result the time would seem to have come when we should pass another act to lay down as far as we can at this time the policy of our Government as to what shall be done as to these water powers and correct deficiencies and misunderstandings as to the earlier acts. I am outlining the history of this matter, so that you can realize that some of us have done the best we could disinterestedly, sincerely, and for years to assist in this legislation and development. The people in my district have no more interest than the people in any other district in the United States. There are no water powers of value for individuals in our locality, though in our State there should be a larger development. But what some of us have tried to do is to practically work out the development of this power and at the same time protect the interests of the people. The result is this bill which is before you. We have made no claim for its perfection. We realize its shortcomings and are ready to remedy them. But we have dealt with novel problems in a practical way, as we think, which will really accomplish beneficial results, both to the people whose interests are foremost and to those who may have the courage and enterprise to initiate work under it.

CRITICISM HEARINGS.

Nearly everyone who is opposed to this bill has complained bitterly, and my very good friend from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] has complained that we had no hearings, substantially, or only of two individuals. Here is one of the differences of opinion and great difficulties in the discussion of this measure. Those of us who believe this measure is proper and should be adopted differ both as to the facts and as to the law with those who do not agree with the measure.

I differ as to the facts with my very good friend from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], with my friend from California [Mr. KENT], with my friend from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], and with my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS]. I do not understand the facts as they do. My views of the law are entirely different from theirs. And, necessarily, we radically differ as to the effect of this bill and the results which would be accomplished under it. So you will understand that as they have discussed the matter in an impersonal way, I shall discuss it also in an impersonal way, giving you the facts and the law as I understand them and on the basis of which I have acted in preparing this bill. We took some testimony, as it seemed to be required. But we had before us a very great mass of facts and opinions, as you will realize, as seemed to me amply sufficient for the preparation of this important legislation.

Now, we had before us this book containing the testimony before the National Waterways Commission on the subject of water-power development, as well as the very exhaustive report, appendixes, and papers contained in such reports. These volumes contain several hundred pages of testimony of the most eminent men in their line in this country. They covered all branches and views upon this subject, and subjected all phases of it to a searching analysis. Among them were Mr. Pinchot, Secretary Fisher, and part of these same witnesses who appeared before the Committee on Public Lands. So we did not believe it was necessary, since the situation had not changed materially from the time this testimony was given, to have further testimony or make additional publication of these same facts. There was enough at hand for everybody who wanted it. Then we had testimony previously taken by our committee on this subject, so there was no need to duplicate that. These gentlemen talk about not having testimony and not hearing witnesses. We had before us all the time the most complete and comprehensive hearings, the ablest papers on all sides of the question, and where we needed additional information we secured it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I suggest to my colleague that in addition to that that he had a view—that is, that the subcommittee made a view—of one of these great projects?

JURISDICTON OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Now the gentlemen have assumed that there were only two committees which have to do with this general subject of water-power development. Let us examine this situation under the rules of the House. The statistics prepared by Mr. Leighton, Chief Hydrographer of the Geological Survey, some years ago, and as inserted in the report of the Conservation Commission, are generally agreed to be the most accurate on the subject, and have been accepted as the basis for the consideration of water-power development. Those statistics show that there are, I think, between 42,000,000 and 44,000,000 potential horsepower upon the public domain out of 61,000,000 potential horsepower in the Nation which may be developed without the use of reservoirs. So that the water-power bill of the Committee on the Public Lands will control probably over 40,000,000 horsepower, and is by far the most important of any of these measures. Of course, included in that are the water powers on Indian lands, which would properly come under the Committee on Indian Affairs under the rules of the House, and there are the water powers on forest reserves which should come under the Committee on Agriculture. But they should all be developed under the same kind of regulations and the same general principles of controlling them should be adopted, because the conditions are similar, whether on the public domain, in forest reserves, or on Indian lands.

NAVIGABLE STREAMS.

Next following are the water powers of navigable streams, where the Government itself has not developed the power. That development would come under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and would cover between 15,000,000 and 16,000,000 potential horsepower. That is, you will see considerably less than half of the power which can be affected by the bill from the Committee on the Public Lands. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors would have charge of the power from dams constructed by the Government itself in navigable streams, and there is probably several hundred thousand potential horsepower in them. This concerns an entirely different class of dams and water power, for which yet different rules must be applied. These dams are constructed by the Government itself solely for navigation, and any water power which may be developed is comparatively small and of slight value. This is so because the water must be used for commerce and not power. The records of the War Department amply show this fact. Then the Committee on Foreign Affairs has jurisdiction over the power from Niagara. I think there might be about 750,000 horsepower there, and a bill is now on the calendar of the House on that subject. The Committee on Military Affairs should have jurisdiction over the water power developed on military reservations, although that is taken away from them by the bill from the Committee on the Public Lands, even against the protest of the Secretary of War himself, as we may point out later under the provisions of that bill.

The result is, as you see, that there are radically different conditions pertaining to the regulation and control of these water powers from the very nature of their being, one condition the Committee on the Public Lands has to consider, and there are other conditions somewhat similar to be considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Committee on Agriculture, and the Committee on Military Affairs. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has jurisdiction of lighthouse reservations which might be affected in some remote instances by a power plant on a navigable stream.

DIFFERENT CONDITIONS.

Now, I think this committee will realize that there must be different rules which should be applied to the regulation of these different kinds and classes of power. You can perceive the reason. My friend from New Hampshire, Mr. STEVENS, stated that the regulation for all of them should be the same, and I think my friend from Wisconsin, Mr. LENROOT, rather assumed that the regulation of the two classes of water power should be the same. But let me show you why they can not be the same. I will take an instance from the districts represented by my friend from Wisconsin, Mr. LENROOT, and myself—a concrete instance. There is a dam across the St. Croix River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota. It is a large dam, formerly controlled by the same Stone & Webster interests which have been alluded to here. That dam cost about $3,000,000. It impounds the water of the St. Croix River, which is a navigable stream. There is actual navigation below that dam, and there has always been actual and valuable navigation from the early pioneer days. The people are determined to preserve that navigation, and the United States has expended probably $125,000 in the improvement of the St. Croix River below that dam, where the people actually navigate.

After the dam was constructed the people who were interested in that navigation demanded that they should continue to have the navigation below that dam exactly as they had enjoyed from the early days of the Territory. So I, as their representative on the subject, went before the War Department, and upon this we had numerous conferences, which finally resulted in the adoption of regulations by the War Department which I here insert, dividing the time and water between the interests of navigation and the generation of power.

REGULATIONS TO GOVERN THE FLOATING OF LOOSE TIMBER, LOGS, AND SACK RAFTS (SO CALLED) OF TIMBER AND LOGS, AND OTHER METHODS OF NAVIGATION ON THE ST. CROIX RIVER, WIS. AND MINN., ABOVE LAKE ST. CROIX.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
April 5, 1904.

In pursuance of the authority conferred by the act of Congress approved May 9, 1900, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of War to make regulations governing the running of loose logs, steamboats, and rafts on certain rivers and streams," the following regulations are prescribed for the St Croix River above Lake St. Croix, Wis. and Minn., a navigable waterway of the United States, whereon the floating of loose timber and logs and sack rafts of timber and logs is the principal method of navigation:

REGULATIONS.

1. During the season of navigation, from May 15 to August 31, the full natural run of water in the river shall be permitted to flow between 1 a. m. on Thursday and 4 p. m. on Sunday of each week, and during the time between 1 p. m. on Wednesday and 4 p. m. on Sunday of each week no logs shall be sluiced out of the Nevers Dam.

2. Except during the period above mentioned, the parties engaged in handling logs upon the river shall have the right to sluice, drive, and float loose logs and to regulate the flow of water in the river as may best suit their convenience, all reasonable precaution being taken to avoid log jams.

3. These regulations shall remain in force until modified or rescinded.

ROBERT SHAW OLIVER,
Assistant Secretary of War.

The result is that from that dam, on which there has been an expenditure of over $3,000,000, the power company can only have a certain proportion of the potential power which might be possibly developed by the dam, and that condition will continue throughout all the future. If that dam were on the public domain, the power company could get 100 per cent of the potential power. At that dam and other dams in navigable streams, like the Keokuk Dam, they can have only a certain per cent fixed by the War Department, which is variable and will continue to vary and really diminish in the future as the interests of navigation shall increase, for we must ever have in mind that commerce is paramount and will be first considered. I do not know how much it is on the St. Croix, but probably the efficiency is only 50 or 60 per cent, when it would be 100 per cent on the projects controlled on the public domain. Here is the basis of the essential difference between the conditions. The situation is true as to the Keokuk Dam. And as to that I wish to state that my recollection of the facts concerning that dam is just as different as night from day, from the recollection and statements of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]. A subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce visited the Keokuk Dam last winter to see what these various troubles were that they complained about. We were there on the ground and interviewed all who were interested in different phases of the controversy.

KEOKUK DAM.

We met the owners and operators and pilots of the steamboats, talked with them and went over the dam with them; we had the dam people and the village people and the city people from Illinois and Iowa and talked with them, and of course the engineers, military and civil, who have charge of that work. From my recollection of those conferences, and the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Georgia are here, not one single fact stated by the gentleman from Illinois is accurate. I represent a river district. My city is the second largest city on the upper Mississippi River, next to St. Louis in the importance of its river navigation. My people are vitally interested in the navigation of the Mississippi River and rely upon it for much of their future growth and prosperity. They did not care anything about power; in fact, the existence of cheap power at Keokuk created a sectional rivalry with us in industrial development, and so it was my business to know that navigation was adequately protected. I went there with blood in my eye to see that navigation was encouraged and given all advantages possible in the use of its waters and facilities. The steamboat men, the pilots, and captains, knew my position and situation and stated to me that if they could have a boom placed around that pier they would be satisfied. We ordered that that should be done. The War Department insisted that it should be done, and the representatives of the power company agreed that these booms should be installed at their own expense. The gentleman from Illinois stated that it had been done at the expense of the War Department. I doubted that, and after he made his statement I telephoned to the War Department and asked what the facts were and who paid for the installation of the boom. I here insert a copy of the telegram from the local engineer at Rock Island to the Chief of Engineers relative to the matter:

Booms have been installed in the fore bay by the Keokuk power plant in accordance with department letter of March 2 and map. They are apparently perfectly satisfactory to the steamboat lines. No complaint has been received. The booms were old ones belonging to the Government. They were borrowed and repaired at considerable expense and installed by the power company without any expense to the Government.

HOFFMAN, Engineer.

The point is that those who debate this measure seem to differ so radically as to the facts as well as concerning the law of this matter——

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman from Minnesota will permit, he will remember that in the conversation at Keokuk the officials of the power company said that they were going to place booms there.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; and the agent of the Government said that they would order the booms placed there, and the steamboat men said that they would be satisfied. We did hear the steamboat people complain that there had not been sufficient water below the dam. We asked the Government engineers why the water was not furnished. They said that it was only for a short time while the power house was being arranged and the water stored above the dam, and after that the War Department would see to it that the steamboat men should be supplied with ample water 24 hours in the day. The steamboat men and the engineers told us that navigation was tremendously benefited by the Keokuk Dam. They have a stretch of 40 miles above the dam that is as good navigation as there is in the world. Below the dam the engineers must regulate the flow from the dam so the channel will have ample water. This bill provides such power and direction for exactly such action to protect navigation.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois is mistaken when he says that the engineers did not supervise the building of the dam. They supervised the laying of every stone in the dam. The law required it and I know the engineers well enough to know that they conscientiously obeyed it. I think the gentleman has not informed himself about the conditions concerning the construction and operation of the Keokuk Dam. They satisfy the navigation interests of the river, and they told us so personally within the last six months.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. They also informed us that they constructed a lock for the accommodation of navigation which cost upward of $2,000,000, and also furnished the power to operate the lock, and expended much more than the law called for.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I have promised to insert as a part of my remarks a statement as to the saving to the people by the reduction of prices for use of electricity from the dam. I here insert, as I agreed with the gentleman from Connecticut

[Mr. DONOVAN], a memorandum concerning the situation as to the consumption of power from the Keokuk Dam:

Users of power benefited: The rates charged by the company are low, ranging from $0.015 per kilowatt hour for the first 8,000 kilowatt hours monthly to $0.006 per kilowatt hour above that amount, with various discounts, including an additional discount of 10 per cent for near-by users. Excess power, subject to interruption on notice, is sold at half these rates. The rate schedules are based on the cost of the works and their operation and maintenance, and are intended to secure a fair return on the actual cash invested in the enterprise. At present, with much of the power unsold, the company is not earning as much as 5 per cent on the actual cash invested, allowing for depreciation only the low estimate of 1 per cent.

Consumers' electric lighting and power costs reduced in the power zone: The Mississippi River Power Co. does not do a retail business. Its power is purchased, however, by lighting companies at Burlington, Iowa; Fort Madison, Iowa; Hamilton, Ill.; Warsaw, Ill.; Keokuk, Iowa; and Quincy, Ill. The following tables indicate the benefits secured to consumers at these points:

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. There are other facts which must be taken into consideration as to difference in treatment of dams on navigable streams and those on the public domain. Remember that a dam on a navigable stream is always subject to the uses of the water for navigation, and one of the essential provisions in our bill is that navigation shall be paramount. That is the very thought of this committee always, that navigation shall be paramount. Making navigation paramount reduces the potentiality of that dam nobody knows how much. The power possibilities may continue to decrease because navigation may continue to increase, and at the end of 50 years it is entirely possible that the dam may not be worth much of anything for a water power.

Mr. KENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KENT. I would like to ask if this bill provides for the change in conditions during the life of the grant in the interest of navigation. As I understand, the original scheme outlined by the Secretary of War runs throughout the grant, and the grant could not be changed in the interest of navigation.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman refers to the second lock. No; and it should not be changed under the terms of the bill. If the gentleman will allow me, I would like to discuss that at another time. As to all the other rules of navigation, the bill does not undertake to lay down any law as to commerce, taxation, and eminent domain. All such constitutional powers of Congress are entirely reserved and are not affected by this bill. You would think to hear gentlemen talk on this floor that we had tied up all the constitutional powers of Congress and prevented their action for half a century. As a matter of fact, we have not tied up anything, have expressly refused to do so on anything except regulating for purposes of hydroelectric power the use of the water at that dam for that period, and that is all we assume to tie up by this bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will pardon me, I want to request the gentleman—as the gentleman from California has raised the question—before he quits the floor to elucidate that feature. My friend from California is a good, fair, generous man, and he does not mean any harm; and I want the gentleman from Minnesota to explain to him, and possibly to others like him, that no plan for the navigation of a river to any considerable extent is undertaken except after a general survey and general scheme. The Government would be foolish to put one of these dams in without a general scheme and survey that we provide for.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get through with this matter. I did not intend to touch upon that subject, but if it be desired I will explain. The plan of the committee was this: Section 3 provides that before the plans for these dams are authorized, and are approved by the Secretary of War, the Chief of Engineers shall submit a comprehensive plan to the War Department looking to the development of all the water resources in that section, and that shall be done at the expense of the applicant for the dam.

Now, when the plans for the dam come before the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers they are required to designate whether or not a lock shall be built in that dam at the time of its original construction. If they order it placed there it must be done at the expense of the applicant for the dam. If not, for 50 years the Government itself, if a lock be required, must pay for the expense of the lock, and the owners of the dam are required to donate the right to do so and provide the land sites and power for operation free of charge. The reason we did not think it wise to require that during the whole period of 50 years a lock might be required to be placed there was because it might prevent small dams being erected at any time at the expense of the owner under this bill. You must remember that a lock costs, on an ordinary dam on a navigable stream, nearly one-half the expense of the dam. The gentleman from Mississippi is more familiar than I am with that matter, but he will admit, I am confident, that nearly one-half the expense of constructing a dam would be covered in the construction of a lock.

Remember that these ordinary-sized dams are constructed as a rule by small concerns. They have a limited financial ability and a limited market. That market as to prices and facilities must be under this bill controlled by utility commissions of the States or by the Secretary of War, as I will show the gentleman, if I can get the time to do so. The prices for their product must be fixed under the terms of this bill, the amount of their earnings is fixed under the terms of this bill. If during these 50 years you compel them to spend 50 per cent additional for a lock, it would be ruin to those enterprises, it would mean that they could not add it to the price, the people would not pay for it, and it would mean finally that the concerns would be thrown immediately into a receivership. The result would be that financial backing can not be expected with such a contingency confronting a company, so there would be no dams at all of any size constructed on small streams or by people of moderate means. This would throw the business entirely into the hands of these large water-power companies, of which these gentlemen profess to be so afraid, and for that very reason we provide that this should wait 50 years, when the whole matter should be newly considered, and then that Congress should have the right to order a new lock, if necessary. If the past be any criterion, this will amount to nothing, because the War Department will not take any chances and if there be any doubt will order in locks in the first instance, and where not so ordered there would be no demand for the time, because no navigation would be possible.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why not give some option to the Government as to whether it should require the payment by the grantee or not? The gentleman says these things are always determined finally in the first instance. At Louisville there have been a half dozen War Department projects since I have been in Congress. They are not always determined at first, but they change from day to day.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. For the first time we ordered that a comprehensive plan of the river be made.

Mr. SHERLEY. And we have that on the Ohio.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. And it is made the business of the engineers to make that plan. We believe the engineers can look forward that length of time and fairly determine as between the Government and the applicant as to what ought to be done during that time, and if an emergency develops which could not fairly be foreseen these people should do their share and the Government should do its share. At the end of 50 years, of course, the Government would have the right to require the owners to put in the lock. The dams are and will always be on stretches of river not then navigable. This country is fairly settled now, so that conditions can be fairly determined upon every navigable stream in the country. The tremendous development and changes of the past 50 years will be an augury for the next half century, and yet the great diversity of radical changes and discoveries can hardly be expected. The situation as to water traffic and uses can be somewhat appreciated, and when the engineers need not take chances and can make their orders to protect the public interests I have no doubt they will do so, and this will be an encouragement to the construction of the smaller dams, and in that way encouragement to the most advantageous development of all our water resources.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman believe the Government engineers can look ahead for 50 years and determine what kind of locks may be necessary on our rivers?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; as I have stated.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is exactly what they will do.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. They can do that fairly, and please allow me to do a little answering. I have no doubt that locks will be installed under this that now really are not needed for navigation, just because of the sentiment expressed by the gentleman from Wisconsin, because engineers will not care to take any chances, and I have no doubt that this will make the cost of the construction of some of these dams considerably greater, so that balancing one with the other, we think it was only fair under all of the circumstances to make this provision. We are confident that under it more dams will be constructed, because the uncertainty is taken away as to increase of cost during its term. We are equally certain more locks and improvements to navigation will be furnished, and there will be a greater development of our water resources.

Mr. SHERLEY. With a study of the Ohio River more detailed than that of any river in America, they have never been able to so foresee the conditions as not to change their plans at Louisville, where the falls are, and they have now in contemplation a change in the height of the dam, which would completely revolutionize any question of power, if there was one there.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That may be true; but at the same time remember that during the last 10 years we have witnessed almost a revolution in the study of navigation and water-power development, and that what could not be done 10 years ago can be done now; and I have no doubt, and those who are acquainted with the engineers have no doubt, that they will exercise the utmost prevision, and where a lock will be needed during these 50 years one will be provided, and where it is not, as I said, it might be ruinous; and for my part I assume the responsibility of stating that I do not think it would be fair to require it.

DIFFERENT CONDITIONS.

If the committee will permit me, I now desire to continue my remarks along the line I started. Gentlemen will now realize that there is a great distinction between streams on the public domain and those for navigation, in addition to the additional costs and contingencies of furnishing locks for navigation and the paramount use of the water for navigation, instead of solely for power covered by the bill of the Public Lands Committee. A stream on a public domain has a steadier flow, as a rule. It generally comes from the mountains, and throughout the year it has a steadier flow than have our rivers in the East, the Central West, and the South. These rivers are subject to great fluctuations, as is shown by the table which I here insert:

The following table, furnished by Mr. Leighton, of the Geological Survey, will give the maxima and minima of typical rivers of the United States at specified points:

Stream and locality.	Maxima.	Minima.	Drainage area.
	Second-feet.	Second-feet.	Sq. miles.
Kennebec, Waterville, Me	157,000	730	4,270
Potomac, Point of Rocks, Md	460,000	790	9,650
Alabama, Selma, Ala	146,000	3,300	15,400
Tennessee River, Chattanooga, Tenn	357,000	4,800	21,400
Mississippi, St. Paul, Minn	80,800	1,200	35,700
Brazos, Waco, Tex	132,000	3	30,800
Yellowstone, Glendive, Mo	107,000	3,750	66,100
Grand River, Palisades, Colo	43,000	944	8,550
Salt River, Phoenix, Ariz	300,000	0	.....
Sacramento, Red Bluff, Cal	254,000	4,650	9,300
Willamette, Albany, Oreg	188,000	1,870	4,860
Clark Fork, Newport, Wash	155,000	5,700	24,000

With the difference which exists by the needs of the water for navigation and from the variable flow, a very large auxiliary steam plant is absolutely necessary in projects on navigable streams, where it might not be needed at all in a project upon the public domain, and that steam plant may cost a very considerable part of the investment in that project. For these reasons, which exist as to nearly every project upon a navigable stream, gentlemen who represent the public domain and those interests, from their experience and point of view, can not adequately lay down the rules for the dams in navigable streams. The conditions and regulations are necessarily entirely different.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is there not just as much difference between various water-power projects upon navigable streams as there is between some on navigable streams and some on the public domain?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I presume that may be true; and yet the terms of our bill make provision for exactly those differences by giving a discretion as to requirements.

Mr. SHERLEY. If that be true, why should we not in dealing with the fundamental requirements make the provision the same as to both, leaving the details of the contract under the general rules that we lay down, to be determined by the particular cases?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is exactly what we have done in our bill. But that may not be necessary in the other measure, and we are being criticized by them for preparing for contingencies for which they are not obliged to consider in their measure.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, allow me to point out, that is just exactly what we have done, and I shall point it out during my remarks. The fundamentals are practically the same. The details are entirely different and ought to be entirely different. Let us see what are the fundamentals, which are the real interests of the people in all of these projects. The first requirement I think we all want and must insist upon is to have the utmost and most advantageous development of all of the water resources upon a stream.

PUBLIC INTEREST.

I think we all agree to that, and if that can be done and eliminate the utmost possible waste that comes by not developing these resources I think we will agree to that. And in developing these natural resources of our waters and eliminating that waste of nonuse of them and the free use of that which need not otherwise be used, we are performing a most useful public work for the public interest. Now, what is the public interest? None of these gentlemen have attempted to define that, all of them have talked very loudly about what should be for the public interest, and have waxed very eloquent in their devotion to the public interest, and very vigorous in their denunciation of this bill as against the public interest. But none of them have condescended to proceed further and inform us what the public interest actually is. But what is the public interest? Let me see if I can define the elements of what constitute public interest in this water-power development. The first element of public interest is that there should be the most advantageous development of all parts of that particular water resource. I do not believe anybody can question the wisdom and soundness of that. The second element of what constitutes a public interest is that the benefits from such development should be distributed fairly so that all parts of the public should have their fair share of these public resources—those who develop, the investors, the promoters, those who assume the hazard; then, those who control, those who patronize, the consumers, those who pay taxes, the general public outside, all should have their fair share of the advantages and benefits caused by that development. I presume everyone will agree with that proposition. The main difficulty must be in its adjustment, and this bill seeks to do that very thing.

Now, third, that development and those who make the development should pay their fair share of the public burdens, whatever they may be, in the way of taxes or anything else. They have no right to expect any special favors in the way of evading public burdens. They should do their full share. They ought not to pay any more than their fair share, and full consideration should be given to their situation as compared with other classes of the community. I do not believe anyone can deny the fairness, soundness, and wisdom of that proposition.

Fourth, wherever these projects shall take or use any Government property they ought to pay for it all it is fairly worth any time they take it and as long as they want or use it and need it, on the terms which Congress may see fit to lay down. I do not believe anybody can controvert the soundness and fairness of such a proposition.

Fifth and lastly, if the public, through its representatives, shall decide that it is for the public advantage or a public necessity that it must take over and use this water resource as it may deem necessary, then fair provision should be made for so doing. This should provide for due notice, care, and protection for the customers and contracts and fair compensation to those who own the property. All of these requirements must be fulfilled and be adequately provided for. I take it none will dispute the fairness and soundness of such a proposition.

Is there anything else? It seems to me these are the five elements which constitute and define the public interest, and I believe that we have met every one of those five elements in the framing of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I shall have to take 15 minutes more.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, I had some time left over from yesterday, and I would be glad to yield that to the gentleman.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I thank the gentleman for his kind offer. Of course, I have control of the time, but I did not desire to use more than my fair share. Now let us consider the immediate situation which is before this committee, the things which actually met us as we sat down to frame this bill in the committee room. The first proposition is that the water-power development on a navigable stream is an extremely hazardous proposition and that its operation is a constant hazard. Everybody who considers the subject realizes that. For example, in my city of St. Paul, on the Mississippi River, there exists difference between the high-water flow of 80,000 cubic feet at flood stage and the low-water flow of 1,200 feet at low water. I think nearly every stream in the West and South is subject to this great fluctuation. The result is that we have floods which wash away and damage, and droughts which refuse almost all power. Both seriously increase the expense of construction, maintenance, and operation of water powers of this kind, and investors are obliged to take into consideration these very facts in practically every project under this bill.

In addition are the engineering hazards and mistakes, which may be serious and expensive and have to be paid for. Mr. Cooper prepared a list of unsuccessful water-power investments in this country, which was placed before your committee, and which I insert as a part of my remarks, which illustrates what every water-power man always has in mind when a project is under consideration, and which legislators must also have in mind if they wish to place upon the statute books a plan which will cause real and substantial development:

I have already outlined the necessities for navigation in the way of added expense, for lock construction and the like, and the loss of water and potential power which must come from the paramount use of this water for navigation. This must require an additional large investment, which must be provided for or the dam can not be successful.

PRICE FOR POWER.

Now, what really determines the price at which this power shall be sold to the public? It is not the Public Utilities Commission which has the sole authority to determine such price. It is not in the power of any legislative body to grant such authority, which can always be made effective. The real determining factor is the competition with others in that same region. It is the price of power developed by coal at that point which really fixes the price at which hydroelectric power can be sold. The commission can only regulate this fact. Now, remember that the power development from coal is more advantageous and more reliable than the power developed by water, for the reason that it is not subject to floods and droughts and natural conditions as to long-distance transmission. Of course, the man who gets the power does not care; it is immaterial to him where he gets the power from. But the cost of generation is material to the man who furnishes it, and where there is a difference of 10 per cent between the cost of generating by steam and by water, if the steam power does not cost more than 10 per cent in excess of the hydroelectric, the steam is always preferred to be installed, for the reason that the owners can put it where they want it and can easily use it. They need make an investment in a steam plant of probably a third of what a water plant would cost. They can borrow and finance as they are obliged to. They can expand in their operations as may be necessary, and certainly it is not subject to such hazard as I have described. The main cost of the steam plant is the expense of its daily operation, fuel, labor, and so forth. While the main expense of the water plant is not in its daily operation, which is comparatively small, but in the interest cost of the investment of the dam and appurtenant works, which may be very large. This is the main expense of a water plant and a small expense to the steam plant. That is the condition which necessarily confronts every project under this bill, and it can not be avoided by prudent men. But another very important phase of this competition must be realized.

IMPROVEMENTS IN STEAM POWER.

These facts were shown to us: At the present time electricity from water power has reached a very high degree of efficiency in its development. It was shown to us that some plants develop nearly 70 per cent of the theoretical efficiency placed at the buss bars of the receiving power house. Thence they run down to 24 and 25 per cent. The idea is that hydroelectric development is at a high degree of perfection, and that, proportionally to steam, not much more can be fairly expected in the future.

That is the opinion expressed by some of the electrical engineers, as shown in the testimony. Steam power will be developed proportionally to a greater efficiency in the future, whereas hydroelectric power is nearly at its height. Now, I have here statements which may be of much interest in this connection, but are too long to be placed in the RECORD. One is from Mr. Edison, to the effect that it is probable in the near future that there will be in use a process by which electric power can be developed directly from coal, saving all the great waste from the various transformations and will utilize a very high per cent of the possible energy. Here is another statement from the American Machinist of June 18 last, showing a successful system of using powdered coal in producing power, with a very large resultant gain. Here the cost was less than with oil, which shows the great economy.

Why, if these improvements shall continue as outlined they will almost destroy the value of most of the water powers of the United States, with the exception of a dozen or so of the most profitable. Just think what it would mean. It now requires from 7 to 17 tons of coal per annum to produce 1 horsepower. If Mr. Edison's plan can be perfected, then it is estimated that a horsepower can be produced from 2½ to 4 tons of coal a year.

Mr. SHERLEY. And if Mr. Edison's prophecy is correct as to getting a storage battery that will really store electrical power, then the water-power plants now having their property destroyed by flood for half a year will have doubled their value.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That can not be done without tremendous increase of investment expense to construct, which may not be profitable. The testimony before us there showed that power is being produced from alcohol in Germany costing, I think, about 16 cents a gallon, and alcohol is produced from sugar waste in Cuba at a cost of about 14 cents. The man who produces this hydroelectric power must take all of these hazards and all those improvements and investments into consideration. We must also realize all these things in laying down rules as to what should be done for the regulation of dams in navigable streams if we expect to have any substantial and profitable utilization of them.

CLASSES OF DEVELOPMENT.

There will be three different classes of development of water power under this bill if it be properly framed and administered. There will be the development used by the owner of it for manufacturing or irrigating or some sort of industry, outside of being sold to the public as a public utility. Then there will be the small dam, the small owner, which will cover only a limited area, with some sort of a public utility, and depending on this power as a basis for his enterprise. Then, third, there will be the larger development, which is necessarily a part or a subsidiary of a large concern, developing water power partly in one place and partly in another place, depending also on steam plants here and there. This plant under this act will be only a small part perhaps of the total production and use of electricity. Thus there may be rigid and uniform rules laid down to govern the last class of development which would work hardship and possible disaster upon the other two classes. That would inevitably happen if the ideas of the extreme conservationists should prevail. The big fellow will take care of himself under their theories. We do not need to worry about him, but the small man, whom we want to encourage, can only do it by having as few restrictions as possible in the bill to hamper him and burden him. So it is well to bear in mind this diversity of conditions, which can only be met by broad, general rules, such as we have laid down in the bill, which must be administered with a sound discretion of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers to accomplish the development and at the same time protect public interests. Every additional restriction means the elimination of the small man, who can not compete with the larger under this added burden. The big plant can stand restrictions, and can generate his power by coal, if necessary. There is not much difference in cost in most places in developing the power by coal and power by water.

SYSTEM MUST GROW.

There is another consideration which these gentlemen have not realized, and that is that in this country a water-power plant is not complete at the start. It is generally placed in the stream to supply a certain territory. The chances are that there never has been a plant constructed where the power is all used at the time the plant is finished. The owners must first go out and develop their power, then find a market for it; hustle around and spend considerable money in developing the market. After the market begins to exist, the time will come when they must extend their plant. They must add more turbines and secure a larger power. The Keokuk plant is an example of that. As we saw it last year it had a power development, I think, of 90,000 horsepower, which had been actually disposed of, out of 120,000 possible development under existing construction and 200,000 when fully completed.

The managers informed us they were extending their markets just as rapidly as they can find customers. I do not know how they will proceed, but if they are acting wrongly the State of Illinois has a perfect right, under its utilities commission, I have no doubt, to protect its own people; the State of Missouri has a perfect right to protect its own people, and the same situation will exist as to the people of Iowa. And if it be not adequately done by these States this bill makes provision for it, as I will try to show when we get to that section. But there is one thing which should be said here, and that is that the State authorities and municipal authorities of Iowa and Illinois did warmly compliment Mr. Cooper, the engineer of the Keokuk Dam, and warmly expressed their satisfaction for his work in many ways. This House should know that fact.

But the point is that a water-power plant is never complete: It continues to grow. It necessarily must grow; additions must be made; it must install new machinery; it must spread new lines of transmission and find new and reliable sources of generation. This requires a constant and increasing expenditure which must always be in the minds of the managers of the plant and of the public officials who supervise it.

Now remember this: That the transmission lines in a water-power utility scheme—that is, the whole transmission system—costs about one-half of the total expense of the whole system. That is, the dam and the power house would be about one-half, and the transmission system would be about one-half.

Those are the approximate values as they were given to us in the testimony to which I have referred. The result is that constantly during that 50 years this concern must get more money, reach further and further on to produce and dispose of its product, and extend its plant, partly by steam, partly by water, keep its appliances up to date, and this requires a constant and large expenditure of money.

AMORTIZATION.

And now I will be pleased to discuss the question of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS]. I have tried to find the testimony of one of the committee given before the waterways commission, and I here insert a statement of Mr. J. R. McKee, chairman of the National Electric Light Association, page 118, testimony before National Waterways Commission 1910, as follows:

On the question, which has been suggested, of amortization within a given period for water-power plants, please keep in mind that you never hear of a railroad amortizing its bonds. I believe that I am correct in this. I recall mentioning it before to four or five prominent railroad presidents one day, and they looked thoughtful, but not one answered. The amortization of railroad bonds has not been undertaken, because it has generally been contemplated that when any issue of bonds became due they would anticipate a reissue of the bonds at a lower rate of interest. If water powers are obliged to amortize their bonds during their limited franchise, it would simply mean it would be prohibitive to their installation, because as the cost of steam power is decreasing, the cost of water power can not decrease, and it is a most misunderstood cost of development to-day.

I venture to quote from a speech of Senator WESLEY L. JONES, delivered in the Senate on March 5, 1914, as follows:

There are those who insist that when a public-service corporation wishes to develop a publicly owned or controlled water-power site, it should be prevented from so doing unless it will agree to give back to the public, free of charge, the property and improvements at the end of a definite period—say 50 years. It can not be denied that if the public eventually acquires a developed power site free of expense at the end of a designated period, said public must, in all equity, pay for it in extra rates during that period. Mark you, that during all the 50 years the public is to have absolute control of rates and service and must therefore penalize itself as to rates so that at the end of the period a future generation may absorb the plant.

In any era of progress each generation is abler and more self-reliant than its predecessor. Unless we are anticipating American decadence, we are bound to believe that the average American 50 years hence will be better able to pay for water-power plants in a lump sum than we are now able to pay for them in installments. The gospel of conservation does not bid us make spineless beneficiaries of our descendants.

A hydroelectric system can not be amortized. The concern is not like a mill or a factory. The mill stands as a relatively fixed investment with a definite capacity for production and a fairly determined earning power. When that capacity is reached a new mill is built which has the same definite investment characteristics as the first. The two mills are independent investment units. Burn one down and the other proceeds as before. Under such conditions the owner may amortize. Just the opposite is true of the hydroelectric system. The public demand for power constantly grows and the corporation is bound to supply that demand. The hydroelectric system is never completed and never becomes a fixed investment unit, because every day sees some new line, connection, or instrument added in response to a new call. When the capacity of the power sources is reached, we do not build a new system as we would build a new mill, but we develop a new source of power and throw it into the same system. That new source of power loses its individuality and becomes a mere element in a large creation. A hydroelectric system is not the sum of its parts, but it is the whole thing, just as man is man and not the sum of sundry arms, legs, and organs. Could one amortize the value of a leg?

It would be easy enough to amortize if there were one power plant, one set of consumers, and the latter never demanded more than the former could furnish, but we are not considering peanut-stand propositions of that kind. Except in rare cases, the real hydroelectric system has several and sometimes many power sources. It usually begins with one or more sources in private ownership. Business grows, and then Government sites may be added, so that private and Government sites are merged and lose their identity in one great network. Now apply this 50-year surrender idea. After a while the time limit on one of these Government sites expires. Who is wise enough to amortize that improvement, or, in the final surrender to the Government, to determine what part of the distribution system is functional to that particular site? One may as well try to unscramble eggs.

Follow the idea to its logical conclusion and it will be apparent that the increase in utilization of power by the public will necessitate the progressive addition of new sites to the hydroelectric system. Therefore, it will certainly occur that at the very time when the public-utility company is acquiring a new site to meet a new demand, it would be surrendering to the Government, free of cost, a site acquired 50 years before and which is still needed in the system to supply current demand. Does the preservation of the public interest really require such a chaotic procedure?

We must realize that in many plants much time will be required before the system will get on a paying basis. The result is that for the rest of the term the concern must get some profit; if that time must also be used to amortize it would make the price too high to the consumer during the term. It would be unfair, as the gentleman from Mississippi so well and clearly stated, to the consumers to make them pay the cost of this plant for the 50 years, and then deed it to posterity free of charge. That is not fair, and it ought not to be done, and it need not be done. If it be compelled in all cases, many dams can not be constructed and those water resources will be wasted. It may be done in a degree by an extension of time and opportunity for cheaper refundment. It may be necessary to do it in some places in degree; but I think the modern trend is that where the plant is constructed fairly, where they develop the resources and serve the public fairly, where they treat the people fairly, the charges must be on a minimum, of course allowing for contingencies and all necessary expenses; but at the end of the term the plant stands for whatever it is worth, and is sufficient security for all indebtedness, principal and interest. That allows each generation to care for itself.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman think that any water-power utility could borrow money without providing for amortization to the extent of the money borrowed?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will say that a committee representing the electrical interests of this country said they could.

Mr. LENROOT. There has not been any company in existence where they have not provided for it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I am stating the views of the committee of engineers who came before the National Waterways Commission. I am willing to accept their views in preference to the views of the gentleman from Wisconsin. But to reenforce their opinions and my own, I will add two concrete cases as to what has actually been done.

Do banking houses require amortization? They do under some conditions, but these conditions and stipulations should be examined before making the broad assertion.

The most recent mortgage indenture covering a large hydroelectric bond issue was that issued by the Utah Power & Light Co. to the Guaranty Trust Co., of New York. The first bond issue under this indenture was $10,000,000, but the mortgage covers an eventual bond issue of $100,000,000, subsequent bond issues to be made from time to time as the company acquires properties equivalent thereto. It is of interest to note that this mortgage provides that no bonds can be issued on any developments located on lands of the United States unless the assured tenure thereon extends to a date not less than 20 years after the maturity of the bond; or if the tenure expires previous to such interval, the property is to be taken over by the United States or its nominee at a price not less than its fair value.

A provision is made for the annual deposit of funds or moneys in an amortization fund, but it is expressly provided that—

> The moneys received by the corporate trustee under the provisions of section 3 of this article—

The section here referred to is the one providing for the amortization fund—> shall, however, be applied by the corporate trustee, at any time within 18 months after the same become due and payable to the corporate trustee, to reimburse the company for 80 per cent of the cash cost (and not exceeding 80 per cent of the fair value) of the additional plants or property or permanent improvements, extensions, or additions to the company's plans or property: Provided—

Here follows certain stipulations with respect to the request of the company for such payment, the proper certification of such request, and a certification by an independent engineer that the additional property, betterments, or improvements are as valuable as represented by the company.

These provisions make thorough recognition of the principles and facts above referred to in the speech of Senator JONES. It will be noted that only 20 per cent of the money in the amortization fund is available for redemption of bonds, and this is a wise provision designed to strengthen the issue outstanding and to provide a reasonable surplus against unforeseen contingencies, so that in the event of financial depreciation the outstanding issue shall not be depreciated.

The affidavit of A. F. Hockenbeamer, of the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., presented in the district court of the United States in and for the northern district of California, March 2, 1914, shows that from the date of its incorporation to December 31, 1913, the company had expended a sum exceeding $54,000,000 for capital purposes, nearly all of which was raised on bond issue. At about that date the company negotiated what was called a "general and refunding mortgage," covering an eventual bond issue of $150,000,000, the terms of which were approved by the Railroad Commission of California. It appears in the aforesaid affidavit that of the total issue of $150,000,000, $50,000,000 were reserved to retire all underlying mortgage bonds. In other words, the previous bonded indebtedness of the company was not wiped out by amortization, but by refunding, and this is the process that will naturally be pursued at the expiration of the new mortgage bonds.

In testimony before the joint commission of the New York State Legislature on the conservation of water, November 15, 1911, Mr. J. R. McKee, who for many years has been identified with the development and financing of water power for electric transmission, made the following statements:

> Q. Assuming the State did undertake and did build these dams, do you think the State would have any right to tax a riparian owner for benefit that he derives therefrom?—A. As to your question as to whether he should pay anything or not, it undoubtedly contemplates what we know as amortization; in other words, should the State carry it forever or make a charge that would repay the cost? You have the precedent of the Reclamation Service of the United States Government for having it repaid; but, as against that, it is a curious thing that no railroad in the United States contemplates amortization. I don't think any railroad bond is issued that contemplates payment. It is only when it comes to water powers, which certainly operate on a much closer margin of profit, that the Government thinks it ought to amortize, but the railroads and electric lighting companies don't amortize.
> Q. Do you think that is true universally?—A. Well, enough so to call it the rule. I don't know of anything to the contrary. There may be possibly some electric lighting companies that would put out a 50-year bond, with a limited sinking fund, but they all contemplate their being there forever, and the reason they issue a limited bond is that they hope the next generation will take a lower rate of interest and exchange it.
> Q. Mr. McKee, do you believe that the modern financiers, even in the large railroads, contemplate that the bonds will never be paid off, except by refunding?—A. I sat at lunch with four very prominent railroad presidents. When I brought up this question they did not say they had never thought of it before. It was something they had never given much thought to. Of course, bonds are made for a definite period, but they are certainly made for this purpose solely. They hope the rate of interest will be lower and that they will be more salable. They retire the bond by replacing it with another.

Mr. TREADWAY. Would the gentleman kindly touch the point that the gentleman from New Hampshire brought up, that this bill does not bring a revenue to the Federal Government in accordance with the terms that were included in a bill suggested for the Connecticut River two years ago?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; I will come to that if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Now, before the gentleman goes to that——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; you understand my time is limited, but I am glad to answer questions as I go along.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. On the proposition that the Government should or should not pay for the plant at the end of 50 years, if the Government is not to pay for the plant, then the inevitable thing that will happen will be that the companies will permit their plants to deteriorate, and the people for the last 5 or 10 years of the term will get very much worse service than they would if the Government was going to pay for the plant.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I am glad the gentleman made that statement. That shows the necessity of planning for the expiration of the term, to protect the interests of the consumers all of the time, and at the end of the 50 years we must make some arrangement so that during the latter part of the term the people will be dead sure to have all the service that is necessary; and that must be by an arrangement for what shall become of the plant at the end of the term. And that is what I shall be glad to discuss right now.

What ought to be done with the plant at the end of the term? Now, as I stated, the views of those who appeared before us were entirely different from those of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. Undoubtedly he has sources of information, but I am giving you frankly the source of my information—the committee of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers. They came before the waterways commission without advocating any particular bill, because their committee had no authority to draft a bill, but only to suggest the theories of legislation in general terms.

Now, what ought to be done at the end of 50 years? There are two different classes of use of this power; first, for manufacturing, and second, for public utilities. As to how much of this power will be used for manufacturing I do not know, but I assume, from what I have heard, that probably somewhat less than one-half will be used for industrial enterprises, such as irrigation, manufacturing, and the like by private interests. The balance will be used in one way or another for public utilities.

Now, what ought to be done with that power at the end of 50 years which may be used for manufacturing or irrigation or some private industrial enterprise? Remember what this bill does and does not do. It does not affect the taxing power of our Government. It does not affect the taxing power of the States, and it does not affect the taxing power of the municipalities. All of them can and doubtless will levy their taxes every minute during these 50 years constituting the term. It does not affect the right of Congress to regulate commerce during that 50 years. Congress does anything it pleases in the interest of navigation, regulating it as to rules, use of water, and so forth, if it sees fit, even to the point of the destruction of the water power. We do not change the law of eminent domain. If, during the term of 50 years, Congress shall find an emergency has arisen so that it needs to take that property, as it has taken or must take other property, Congress has the perfect right under this bill to do it.

The only thing we do here is to authorize the placing of a structure in navigable streams, to remain for 50 years, under these terms in the bill; that it shall be operated in the interest of navigation, or that a lock shall be placed there or may not be placed there, and that the owners shall observe certain rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I shall use 10 minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

Now, what ought to be done with that dam and appurtenant plants at the end of that time? If the United States wants to take the plant over, it can do it. It could do it before on the same terms for what it may be worth. What object is there in taking such a plant; what public benefit can we now conceive will be subserved by reserving a right to take it then when we can secure it at any time by paying for it? You have practically all of the sovereign rights exercised during all those 50 years except the right to require a lock at the expense of the owners if not first installed. That right is practically the only thing that this bill reserves to the owner or takes from Congress. If you wish to make different terms at the end of that 50-year period, under our constitutional limitations that ought to be done. Everyone agreed that such right should exist, but we disagreed as to its reservation in the bill as reported and as to its value. My own judgment is that the original bill was sufficient, but I yielded my judgment for harmony among my colleagues.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman state, before he takes his seat, whether the prices charged by this great company on the Mississippi River are fair and equitable?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will answer that when I get to the next point.

Of course the prices of the products of these manufacturing plants must be competitive. They must compete with other concerns here and abroad. They must compete with similar articles accomplishing a like purpose. The world's competition applies to them.

Now, I do not wish to censure anybody, but I think the statements made to this committee by those who pretend to state what other governments have done concerning water-power development and privileges have been grossly unfair and misleading. In not one single instance have the statements been accurate; not one.

OTHER NATIONS.

Now I want to state what other countries have done and how they compete with water powers and their products here. These gentlemen cite Canada as their chief illustration. For Canada they cite the Province of Ontario. Now, the Dominion of Canada has exactly the same relation to the Province of Ontario that the United States has to the State of New York. The Province of Ontario has enacted the laws stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] and other gentlemen, but these gentlemen have neglected to inform you that under those laws there has not been any practical development of any water power whatever in the Province of Ontario, and I want them to put it in the RECORD if there has been any development of any consequence. I assert that law will not allow it. The great development which was had at Niagara was had under a long lease of more than a century before the passage of that law which they referred to, and they have not told you the facts about it. These gentlemen boast about the Ontario system.

I here insert an extract from the conclusions taken from the report of the joint committee of the New York State Legislature on the conservation and utilization of water power with respect to the service of the hydroelectric commission of Ontario:

1. That the hydroelectric power commission has never developed any hydroelectric power, but has acted merely in the capacity of middlemen in the merchandizing of electrical energy.

2. That power is not furnished by the hydroelectric power commission to the municipalities at cost, but below cost.

3. That if the same methods of bookkeeping and business principles were applied to the operations of the hydroelectric power commission as are employed in ordinary business transactions of a similar nature the hydroelectric power commission would be found to be losing at least $200,000 a year, besides which the expenses of the commission itself for the year 1912 amounted to $173,090, which amount has been paid by the Province and has never been included in the cost of the power charged to the communities supplied.

4. That the power that is now being sold to the city of Toronto by the Hydroelectric Power Commission at $15 per horsepower actually costs the commission over $19 per horsepower.

5. That the power which the Hydroelectric Power Commission now sells to the city of London for $24 actually costs the commission over $43 per horsepower.

6. That in addition to the provincial loss from the operations of the Hydroelectric Power Commission the net loss down to June 30, 1912, of the city of Toronto from the operation of its own local municipal electric system was $286,984.

7. That in order to utilize the large amount of power the various municipalities have contracted to take from the Hydroelectric Power Commission they have greatly increased the municipal consumption, until in several cases the city itself is paying over 50 per cent of the gross amount received from the operations of the municipal power plants.

8. That the three larger cities of Toronto, Hamilton, and London, in order to utilize the power thus contracted for, have increased their annual expenditures for public lighting and power service more than $225,000 a year, which amounts to municipal extravagance, the burden falling upon the taxpayer.

9. That inequalities in the proportionate amount of capital cost charged against various municipalities appear to be inevitable in any attempt to serve by governmental process a variety of consumers; in fact, the cities of Toronto and Hamilton, comprising 74 per cent of the population served, are required to pay for power a price based upon 24 per cent of the cost of the transmission system, and to amortize only that proportion of the capital investment, while 14 small villages, containing only 7½ per cent of the population served, or one-tenth of that of the two cities mentioned, are required to bear the burden and pay nearly 30 per cent of the capital cost.

10. That while the Hydroelectric Power Commission was designed to deal with municipalities only, it appears that it has deviated from that rule and is in several instances furnishing power directly to private corporations.

As I promised to do, I here insert a statement laid before us relative to the water-power situation in Canada as it really exists to-day, not as these gentlemen have informed, or, rather, misinformed, the House:

FOREIGN WATER-POWER LAWS.

DOMINION OF CANADA.

Water-power jurisdiction in Canada is divided between the general Dominion and the Provinces in a manner quite similar to that between the Nation and the States in this country. The General Dominion Government holds lands and water rights subject to disposal without reference to provincial law, just as Congress holds at its disposal lands and other rights without reference to State laws. The Dominion Provinces also have lands and water rights over which they have sovereignty in the same manner as do our States.

The best compari on between the present legislative proposal in Congress and Canadian law is afforded by the general law of the Dominion, which provides as follows:

(1) Licenses are issued for 21 years, renewable for three further consecutive terms of 21 years each. This is equivalent to a permit for 84 years, which is 34 years longer than the term specified in the Adamson bill or in the Ferris bill.

(3) The property may be taken over by the Government at any time the minister of the interior may decide such action to be in the public interest or for default or misconduct on the part of the licensee; but in such case bonus is paid to the lessee according to the following schedule: If works have been in operation less than 5 years, 30 per cent bonus; more than 5 and less than 10 years, 25 per cent bonus; more than 10 and less than 15 years, 20 per cent bonus; more than 15 and less than 20 years, 15 per cent bonus; more than 20 years, 10 per cent bonus.

(4) No license may be transferred without the written consent of the minister of lands.

(5) Rates and service are regulated by the board of railway commissioners of Canada.

The law also contains many other stipulations in the public interest of the usual character and not important in the present discussion.

PROVINCE OF QUEBEC.

This Province gives patents to water powers in perpetuity. The greatest menace to the establishment of electrochemical and electrometallurgical industries in the United States is, at the present moment, the existence of over 1,000,000 horsepower on the Saguenay River. Patent was given to this entire power for the sum of $15,000, with a penalty provided of a further payment of $15,000 if improvements to the amount of $1,500,000 were not made within three years. At the present moment an enormous investment is awaiting the decision of Congress at this session, for the purpose of determining whether it shall locate nitrogen fixation works, including fertilizers and explosives, in the United States, or whether it shall go to Saguenay River, in Quebec. If this company is driven to Canada it will settle the status of the nitrogen industry under a foreign flag for a long period of years. It is well known that our Government powder plants have not a war-basis capacity, and the War Department is very earnest in urging necessity for patronizing our commercial powder plants, in order to make them available in time of war. The department is also slowly accumulating 65,000,000 pounds of Chilean nitrates, and we are paying the price therefor fixed in Europe. We are absolutely dependent on foreign sources for nitrogen, and now come into competition with 1,000,000 Canadian horsepower, given in perpetuity for $15,000. Incidentally we have the same competitive conditions in Iceland, where practically unlimited power is offered for nothing.

PROVINCE OF ONTARIO.

The great water-power developments of this Province, especially at Niagara, have been made under lease for 110 years, with the privilege of extension to 130 years. No developments of any consequence have been made under the terms of the present law, which is abstracted below.

The Province has entered upon the policy of Government ownership, but so far has never developed any hydroelectric power. It has constructed a great transmission system, but is acting merely in the capacity of middleman in the merchandising of electrical energy.

NORWAY.

These gentlemen also have been misled and have incorrectly outlined the situation in Norway, so I will place in the RECORD a statement from the consul general of Norway showing the rates and conditions there:

WATER-POWER TAXES IN NORWAY.

The following is taken from a translation of the sections of the Norwegian water-power law relating to taxes. The translation was made by the consul general of Norway for the city of New York:

The municipality imposes a tax of not less than 2.7 cents and not greater than 27 cents per horsepower year.

The Federal Government imposes a tax of not less than 2.7 cents and not more than 27 cents per horsepower year.

Thus the total tax paid is not less than 5.4 cents and not more than 54 cents per horsepower year.

In the case of the last water-power concession made in Norway the municipal and governmental tax combined was fixed as follows:

For the first 10 years, 13.5 cents per horsepower year; for the following 5 years, 20.25 cents per horsepower year; for the remainder of the term of concession (80 years), 27 cents per horsepower year.

In presenting the foregoing information the consul general says:

No other taxes are paid for the acquisition or regulation of water power in Norway.

Whenever a water-power project involves the impounding of water in a lake which is in public ownership, by raising the level thereof by the construction of a dam, the only charge paid to the Government for the right of way is from 27 cents to 54 cents per horsepower made available by the regulation improvement. The grantee thereby secures an easement, which is coterminous with the franchise. Of course the power developed by this water at the power plant located downstream is subject to the same rate of taxation as is the power developed from the natural stream flow.

The usual price paid in the United States for undeveloped water-power sites involving transfer of ownership in fee, whether the land constitutes an actual power site or a storage reservoir, is $10 per horsepower. Contrast this with the amount paid for Government sites in Norway. The price fixed in the regulations of the Interior Department and the Forest Service for water-power permits varies from 10 cents to $1 per horsepower year, in addition to which the permittee is obliged to pay all State and county taxes and the corporation and income taxes of the Federal Government.

NORWAY.

The new law of Norway provides:

(1) That franchises for water-power development shall be granted for periods of from 60 to 80 years.

(2) That a royalty shall be assessed of 1 crown (about 26.5 cents) per horsepower year.

(3) That the plant shall be taken over by the Government at the end of the franchise period without payment.

It should be emphasized that the great water-power developments which have placed Norway upon the industrial map were made under franchises given in perpetuity. The great nitrogen fixation installations involving 450,000 horsepower were made under perpetual grants. No great installations have been made since the above law went into effect and those who are familiar with the situation state that the outlook is dubious. It should be noted that Norway water powers are among the most inexpensive in the world. The present big installations on an average cost from $6 to $7 per horsepower. The average cost in this country is over $100 per horsepower. A very cheap investment might be commercially possible under the Norway law, whereas expensive developments like those in this country would be impossible to finance under the same conditions of law. In other words, it is not sufficient to compare the laws but we must also take into consideration the amount of money involved in development.

REPUBLIC OF FRANCE.

Attention should be called to the statement on page 529 of the hearing before the Committee on the Public Lands on the Ferris bill. This statement, furnished by the National Conservation Association, begins by saying that the law, subsequently set forth, was passed by the House of Deputies and would be in force at an early date. Very cleverly, however, the responsibility for the statement is placed on the Counselor General at Paris. The facts are that this law has not been enacted and at the present time has not even fair prospects of enactment. This statement has been confirmed by reply to cabled inquiry addressed to the Chief Engineer Department of Public Works of France.

The French law distinguishes between navigable and nonnavigable water courses. On the nonnavigable courses, riparian rights prevail as they do in the eastern part of the United States. Navigable water courses are a part of the public domain and power development thereon must be made under permit. The situation is precisely the same as in the United States. The permits are revocable without indemnity and consequently there has been little or no power development on navigable streams. For years there has been a general protest because of this embargo and the matter has been actively discussed by legal and scientific societies. The law proposed by M. Baudin, which the Conservation Association would have us believe is in effect, provided for a limited franchise and for the taking over by the Government of all structures at the end of the franchise period without indemnity to the owner. As above stated, that bill has so far been rejected by Parliament.

SWITZERLAND.

The advocates of a destructive water-power policy have endeavored to make much capital over the fact that authority over the Swiss water powers has been conferred on the General Government. This does not mean, however, that a destructive policy has been entered upon. Switzerland is a small country. Practically every stream is common to two Cantons. Therefore, intercantonal jurisdiction is necessary. It is significant that the act which transferred jurisdiction to the Federal Government of Switzerland provides as follows:

"All water rights to which the terms of the federal law do not extend shall be under the jurisdiction of the Cantons, which shall dispose of the concessions, regulate the same, and impose taxes and fees for their use, but such regulations, taxes, and fees shall not be so severe as to prevent or inhibit the development of water powers.

"The National Government shall regulate and dispose of concessions for powers located on intercantonal and national boundary streams and shall determine taxes and fees to be imposed thereon after hearings have been granted to the Cantons interested, but such taxes and fees shall be calculated by the Cantons."

The various cantonal laws are too diverse to be briefly reviewed. The most striking point is the eagerness of the authorities to adopt special laws or regulative measures for power development. A few months will sometimes suffice to procure a special law. The Water Power Co. of Avancon, in Canton of Vaud, was organized in March, 1897, for the purpose of developing 3,000 horsepower for public-utility purposes. In April, 1897, the necessary capital, $2,362,000, was raised. The work was commenced in May, 1897, and the distribution of power began in January, 1898. All this involved a special act which gave full security to the investor, and it was necessary to secure much property under condemnation proceedings. Nothing was allowed to delay or interfere with the development of this power. In the United States one might conservatively look ahead to a two-years' delay in the passage of an enabling act.

There is the prospect of almost unlimited water-power development in Iceland and South America, which will seriously compete with the United States. The grants from the Governments will be extremely liberal, capital will be amply protected, and rates of freight to the United States will be exceedingly low, and our customs tariff rates will allow an easy admission of their products to compete in our markets.

In summing up the present aspect of foreign water powers it will be noted that, irrespective of general foreign statutes on the subject, large grants in perpetuity have been made, either under special act or at a date previous to the enactment of present laws. In the practical development of water powers for industries in this country we are placed in competition with the old perpetual grants in foreign countries which are not yet developed, and if we desire the industries we must make our legislation somewhat more liberal than we otherwise would.

The great development in Norway of over 400,000 horsepower was under a perpetual grant, not under the grant stated and outlined on this floor by these gentlemen who are opposing our bill. They have not stated the matter accurately to this committee. Whoever furnished this information to the committee did not supply them with accurate information, and to his shame be it that he has tried to mislead the committees of this House and tried to mislead this House itself.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. KENT. I merely wish to state that the facts as expressed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and others are matters of record in the hearings had before the Committee on Public Lands, and they were furnished to the committee by the man in charge of the hydroelectric work in the Department of Forestry, Mr. Merrill.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I read the hearings, and I notice that one of the gentlemen of the conservation association stated that he would furnish them; but the facts are inaccurate, no matter who furnished them.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman started in on the subject of recapture and then did not pursue it. Is the gentleman going to deal with the right of recapture by the Government after 50 years?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. As it was affected by the bill as it originally stood and as it has been amended?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Does the gentleman hold that the Government has a right to condemn that property within the 50 years?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. At any time.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Is that provision in the bill?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No. A provision in the bill is not necessary. It is a general provision of law understood in the drafting of the bill.

Now, I return to the inquiry of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]. What ought to be done with these public utilities at the end of 50 years? I think, as I stated, that the first object always is development, and the second is fairness in looking after the interests of the people, the third, that there should be equality in bearing public burdens, fourth, that public property should be adequately paid for, and, fifth, that when necessary the public may take the property. That means that everybody shall have what they ought to have out of this development of natural resources. So that during the latter part of the term, as was clearly pointed out by my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], an arrangement shall be made by which the service shall be supplied to the people wherever it is necessary, so that the service shall be continued and that the plant shall not deteriorate. Now, what ought to be done in order that these things may be accomplished? The bill, as reported from the committee, provided that on one year's notice the United States should have the right of entry or recapture or retaking or whatever you call it and pay a fair value for the property.

The rule as to tenure which we laid down is the one that is practically enforced in the States of Massachusetts and Wisconsin. In those two States they have public utilities with an indeterminate term, with the right of the public to take the property on fair notice and on payment of fair value. Now, so far as the law goes in those States, that practically gives them a perpetual franchise, so the gentleman describes it, but that is an inaccurate definition. It is an indeterminate term, exactly as we provide at the end of the 50 years for these grants; and the committee thought that such an indeterminate term, with the right to take the property at any time on one year's notice preserved the public interest, did protect the consumer, did protect the public, and did protect the Government. Some gentleman objected. I thought the old plan did not contemplate or allow a perpetual franchise, any more than do the laws of Wisconsin and Massachusetts. It was an indeterminate term, as provided in those two States.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. In those States it can be determined by the legislative body itself in any way that it chooses. Under your original bill it could only be determined by buying it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It would only be determined in those States by paying a fair compensation.

Mr. LENROOT. Or changing the provisions of the law as the State saw fit.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. LENROOT. I know about the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I have examined the laws as best I could, as I found them in the report of the National Civic Federation. But the State of Wisconsin, the State of Massachusetts, and the United States can not take the property of these people or anybody unless they pay a fair compensation or provide otherwise in their contract, and there is no such contract provision, because either the rates would be too high under it and the people would not stand it, or there would be no development. Now, that is the term in those States, and we use practically the same language which those States use. By an amendment we have changed it to provide that the United States, through Congress, may do as it seems wise at the end of the 50 years.

Now, what additional right does that give? At any time we can not take that property unless we pay for it, unless those people who own it get their money in fair value. If we do not do that, and if they adopt the method which the electrical engineers told us should be adopted of charging only fair and just rates and give the best possible service and not to amortize during the 50 years, as many of them can not amortize during the 50 years because of the condition of their business, then we must pay for their property, and it must be thoroughly understood or there will be no property. Unless we do, the plant will deteriorate to nothing during the last 5 or 10 years, the people will not get the service, and the public will be seriously injured. So the question recurs as to what we are going to pay. A fair compensation of value or cost? The water-power people came before us and advocated cost. We changed it to fair compensation, for this reason: Nobody can tell what may happen at the end of 50 years. Some of these dams may not be worth blowing up, because of a change of business, change of navigation conditions, a change in the method of generating and transmitting power. The changes may be so startling that the public should not fairly take the risk. It is not asked to. If it should not take the risk, it ought not in fairness to have the increment.

I have already shown to you that there may be changes of navigation, so that the uses of navigation will require the entire flow of the stream. The result is that if we here provide for the payment of cost upon acquisition, we believe on the whole the public would get the worst of it. There are other reasons to consider why this may be true.

TAXATION.

One of the most important is the question of taxation. If we provide only cost for acquisition of the property, the local communities could not secure a tax upon the property higher than the basis of that cost in putting that property upon the tax roll. That would be the maximum limit of any assessment for taxation, and the sense of justice could not fix anything above what the owners would have to surrender it for at the end of 50 years. If, however, we allowed a fair value for the taking, then the community will get the added increment on the tax rolls of those communities. Now, we know that all over the United States our communities are bonding themselves to the limit. It is not good policy as a rule to do it. They are going too far. But is it right for us to take away from their tax rolls a considerable part of their taxable possibilities when they need it the most? It does not seem to me it is. If we give them the opportunity to tax this added increment—and remember that all of the time the rates and service for the public are under the control of a public commission, either State or National—the average rate of taxation in the United States for about 30 years would more than eat up that added increment. Under those circumstances we have believed that it is for the benefit of the community, both in the way of service and in the way of taxes, for the benefit of the Government, for the benefit of the owners, for the benefit of everybody, that we should use the words "fair value" as they are used in the State statutes.

These gentlemen have urged the change, and we have made the amendment—that wherever lands are acquired from the United States or any State or subdivision thereof, then only the cost should be paid by the Government for the acquisition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used one hour.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will use five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Among the things that the Government is to pay for at the end of the time is the lock or locks and the other aids to navigation.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is right.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What does the Government get in exchange for its franchise that it gives to this company? My understanding was that the company was to build the lock or locks and other aids to navigation which were required at the outset to pay the Government for the value of the franchise which was being given to it. At the end of 50 years are we to pay them back what the lock cost them?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. If we take over the property.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What reason is there that we should pay them for the lock or locks?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The United States is to pay the expense if it takes over the property. If it sees fit to let the matter continue, not perpetually as some gentlemen have inaccurately stated, but for an indeterminate term, so long as it be for the public interest, the Government gets the use of that structure for navigation indefinitely without any charge. The owners are pledged to furnish the power, pledged to care for the locks, and if the Government sees fit to have that stream improved in that way without spending a cent for it, it does get that benefit if it believes that it is for the public interest to so continue at the end of that term. That is what will be the case in nearly every structure under this act. What ought it to pay if it takes the property? If the Government entered and took it according to the gentleman's view, what would that mean? It would mean in a small dam that 50 per cent of the cost of that dam would be paid by the consumers of that power in the locality during the term. In other words, that the consumers contribute that much to help the Government, which is not done by any other community which would have exactly the same facilities afforded by the bill from the gentleman's committee. The point is that such a plan would be an unjust burden on the consumers and an unjust discrimination against the community in which the structure is placed. It would mean that the public commission must consider this sum in allowing rates and that if not taken the community would pay double the expense. In the end the consumers must pay for it; the company can not pay for it. They are not a charitable society for such purposes. The consumers of that limited locality would thus have an additional burden which the other people of the United States do not have. They would then have to pay for that lock, which would be an unfair burden compared with the dam which is erected where the lock is not erected or does not amount to such a proportion.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman understand that the bill at the end of 50 years permits the Government to do one of two things—permit the grant to continue or take the property?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; and one other, as Congress may deem wise.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman understand that Congress can fix new conditions upon the grantee at the end of 50 years?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; though I do not believe the conditions will amount to much.

Mr. SHERLEY. But has it the power? Does not the gentleman think that Congress at the end of 50 years ought to be able to make a new contract either with the original grantee or any other grantee?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Well, let us see what kind of a contract can be made.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am asking the gentleman whether there ought not to be that power.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We give them the power, but I do not think it amounts to much.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not your bill simply do this—say to the original grantee you shall continue by sufferance unless Congress affirmatively takes action or buys the plant?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is the indeterminate plan.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it not a fact that by the inertia of the Government you enable, if there is opposition—as there always will be by the grantee to more onerous terms—you enable him to continue indefinitely on the original plan?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is the indeterminate plan which has operated so successfully with the States. Consider what can be done at the end of 50 years. First, the necessary facilities must be provided for the people as they may need, at the least expense commensurate with good service. That must be assumed as a basis for our action. Remember, too, as to this dam the public authority will be exercised as to the right and power and extent of regulation to insure such facilities and rates.

Mr. SHERLEY. But is that true?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Most assuredly. There is no question about it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman mean to say that in all the States provision is made for the regulation of cost at which power is sold to private manufacturers and private individuals?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I make the statement that this bill provides a method of public regulation, which we think is sufficient, by the States as a preference, if not by the Federal Government.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is going on the assumption that the States will regulate that matter, but that assumption is not borne out by the facts.

Mr. BRYAN. It makes it possible.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Such a statement does not do justice to the States or credit to their accusers. Let me state what we are trying to do. During the original term and at the end of 50 years there is, as we assume, an adequate public regulation of facilities and rights so that the people properly are cared for; the community is looked after so that they are getting the advantages of the project in the way of good and reasonable service. I think it a slander and reflection on the American people to assume they have no capacity to insure such protection for themselves. Secondly, if there be an additional burden in the way of taxation the people must pay it, but they can raise such taxes at any time during the life of the project. They do not have to wait until the end of 50 years. Any burden in the way of taxation can be placed at any time, because this bill in no way assumes to affect the taxing power.

Mr. SHERLEY. What does the gentleman mean by that?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Anything by way of a charge.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman believe that the Federal Government should get anything for its franchise?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman from Kentucky has asked me to discuss the same subject which the gentleman from Massachusetts asked me to discuss. I will discuss that after I have yielded to the gentleman from California.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I will use 10 minutes more.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, as I read the bill, the big question in the bill is the question of recapture.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. KENT. To maintain for future generations their right to enter on their own property.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We do not assume that. Our bill assumes that this property is private property.

Mr. KENT. The gentleman has a time limit to his bill.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; 50 years.

Mr. KENT. Fifty-three years.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; the gentleman is speaking of his own bill.

Mr. KENT. There are three years in which to build the dam, and after the completion of the dam it runs for 50 years?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; that is correct, only under some circumstances it might be slightly less or indefinitely longer; the Government regulates that.

Mr. KENT. The bill provides in one place that Congress shall be empowered to make new terms at the end of that time, and in another place it is provided that before entering upon that property Congress shall be forced to pay for everything that is ancillary to that project. Which of those two clauses goes? Do we have to buy every irrigation plant, every street car, everything else; or do we have a real chance to make new conditions? That is what bothers me about the bill.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. As I understand sections 9 and 10 as changed, it is this: I discussed, as the gentleman from Kansas desired me to do, the indeterminate term. It has been changed to give Congress authority to make such conditions as it may deem wise at the end of 50 years. What conditions can be made? Of course at that time Congress could provide different means for acquiring the facilities or the use of the structure. It could undoubtedly prescribe a different method of securing the property, which did not confiscate it. If our Constitution shall last that long, it can provide for an additional term of years, and at the end of that time another contract or arrangement or conditions may be prescribed, provided that such contract or conditions shall not be prohibited by the Constitution. That must always be had in mind as a limit to the power of Congress. I shall discuss that in a few moments, as I promised to do.

Mr. KENT. But here we have a statement in the bill that we have to buy everything that is ancillary to the project.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. As to that, I think that provision is about the same which the States have applied to similar subjects. We have nothing to do with irrigation plants.

Mr. KENT. Why, certainly. The bill provides that we have to buy everything the value of which will be injured by the taking over of this project by the Government.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. If we do not have a provision that everything that clearly belongs to and necessarily connects with the plant should be purchased, then we can not expect that any of those facilities will be furnished the people during the last years of the term, and the plant will not be used to its capacity unless we provide that those things which make the plant valuable shall be taken over and cared for honestly and sincerely. You can not secure those facilities for the people during the term at a reasonable rate unless they shall be taken and not destroyed at its close. If you destroy them, then they must be paid for during the term, which might be unjust and unreasonable. The only fair plan is to take the property as it exists and pay for it what it is fairly worth. Any other plan will not succeed, either by preventing development or by securing expensive and inadequate service. The gentleman would be running against the very proposition he desires to avoid. You will not have a complete development of water power or you will not have cheap and decent service.

Mr. KENT. I would like to know what we have to buy. Do we have to buy every last street car, every last advertising space in the last trolley car, the last irrigation scheme, before we can enter upon our own property?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, no; the gentleman has not any property. He does not seem to grasp the situation. The United States, or the people, have not any property rights here for which they have not been fully paid under the bill.

Mr. KENT. The United States has not any property?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No. I will discuss that in a few moments. What you have to buy is what fairly belongs to that plant, which makes it operative for the public interests during that term, and that is what you ought to buy; and if you do not buy it, the public will not get the facilities and the development can not possibly be made.

Mr. MADDEN. Does that include the right of way over which the transmission lines run?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I presume so.

Mr. MADDEN. And their accretions?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; necessarily, as the accretions may be the very essence and the valuable part of the plant. It may be the very purpose for which it exists, and the people could not be properly served without them. Indeed, it is safe to say they would not be served. Now these are necessary. They will not be favored unless the owners are convinced they will be paid for either by rates for daily use or in the taking if the public shall want the property. We must bear clearly in mind the fact that this bill provides for a private plant, not a public one, unless the Government wishes to pay for it.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. There is nothing in this bill that prevents the grantee from using the power himself.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. He is not obliged to sell it?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. As a matter of fact, will not a great deal of this power be used for private manufacture by the grantee?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think I said that nearly one-half of it would be.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Is there any regulation of any of that business where it is used by the grantee?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will come to that in a moment. But I think my friend will realize that all business will be regulated now. The customs tariff will affect most of the articles produced by the use of water power in the chemical and metal industries. The trade commission will probably investigate them regularly and regulate their practices. The Sherman law will compel them to compete. The corporation-tax law will compel them to bear their share of the burdens, and the State and municipality will take their toll also as the business proceeds. That seems to me considerable of a regulation.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Chairman, section 9 provides that at the end of 50 years the Government may recapture. Suppose the Government does not effect a recapture, but Congress seeks to impose additional terms. Has not Congress the power then to absolutely, by the additional terms it imposes, tax the property out of existence, so far as private ownership is concerned?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; as a theory, but not as a matter of fact, if there be any constitutional safeguards then remaining; and that I will discuss in connection with the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts. It can not do it as a matter of fact, because taxes must be uniform and equal to all in the class. That would save personal rights. It can make a contract limiting the terms, and, I presume, provide how the property might be acquired at the end of that term; but I take it as a matter of fact it could not be done except under the limitations of the Constitution of the United States preserving some sort of individual rights yet to our citizens.

I hope these safeguards are not all to be swept away in the desire to get the desirable property of the thrifty and enterprising. If such a time shall come or if such a spirit shall prevail, then the liberty of the individual has departed and the hope of individual progress is gone.

Mr. LINDBERGH. But, as a practical proposition, will not the company that makes the improvements have to take into consideration in making the investment that the United States may impose terms that they can not meet at the end of 50 years, and, therefore, during the 50 years they must collect a certain amount to protect them in their investment, which, of course, would be added to the price of the service and paid by the public?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; that has to be considered. That is why I stated I did not believe in the amendment added by the committee; but at the same time it does give that additional power, and may have to be considered in regulating charges and service and the fate of the enterprise at the expiration of the term.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is proceeding upon the idea that at the end of 50 years Congress will not be willing to deal fairly with the company. My objection to the whole program is that while professing to give 50 years you are giving more than 50 years, and putting every obstacle in the way of changing the terms of the lease.

I would make them come and get a new contract, because I am not willing to assume, as the gentleman is, that the Government is going to enforce what is an unfair condition at the end of 50 years.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman has touched a point I think ought to be considered. The trouble with his proposition is this: If the term absolutely expires at the end of 50 years no additional development probably will be made during the last 10 or 15 years, even conceding that any large project can exist under such terms. For this reason, and I will give you my experience before this very Congress in a matter I shall have to discuss for a few moments before you during the progress of the bill. A dam is being constructed by the United States between St. Paul and Minneapolis. For the last three years I think I have pounded my good friend from Mississippi and the other members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to induce them to report a bill to give the right to our State and cities as a public enterprise to use that power and pay for it all it is worth, so that we can know what to do and what would be the basis for our action. But Congress is so busy and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors is so tremendously busy on tremendously big projects all of the time that they can not pay attention to little matters. They can not find the time and strength. I know it, and so sympathize with them. We are so overwhelmed with matters of importance in Congress now that we ought not to have these little matters come to us for our congressional action, because we know they will not be properly attended to.

I think the only safe thing to do is to continue it with the people who operate it properly during their term, in order that the power shall be utilized to the greatest advantage, and all the time regulate their service and charges and treatment of the public and then provide that they should continue on fair terms. If they do not so do, then we have the reserve power to throw them out, take it ourselves or turn it over to somebody who can do it better. What I would have would be that the Secretary of War—I would not leave it to Congress—should have authority, in his discretion, to make whatever adequate terms he sees fit, within limits prescribed by Congress. That is my own theory, not that of the bill. My impression is that Congress is so unwieldy, its committees have imposed upon them so much work, that their business is congested; that adequate action at the end of 50 years could not be had. Everybody would know it and so calculate. The result would be a limited term with the increased prices and poorer service. That is why it is not safe to depend upon the inertia of Congress and the results of it. What we want to do is to have the operation of these plants continue all the time in the best possible way, so that the people will get the benefit of it. The only way we could agree upon is provided by this bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, is not the gentleman by his argument strengthening my statement by saying that Congress would be so busy you will be giving a perpetual franchise?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Not at all; any emergency or bad faith can always be met. I stated my own view of it that I would give the authority to the Secretary of War. If I recall, Congress has acted in a somewhat similar case in the Tennessee River. There was some difficulty, but it was handled to the advantage of the Government.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would be willing to give it to the Secretary of War with this provision that he would make the company take the initial step to get a new life, whereas the gentleman would make the Government take the step in order to change the life.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The difference would be this, that I am very much afraid you could not have the development of the power during the last few terms.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to close, but I will take 10 minutes additional in order to finish what I am discussing. The point I make to my friend from Kentucky is this, that under his theory the power would not be developed, the people would not get the service, or it would be inadequate and insufficient, and where we have the right to control the service and the rates, where we have the right to acquire for a fair compensation, I believe that protects the Government better than taking the chances of the inertia the gentleman speaks about. Now, I desire——

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. The question of perpetual franchise has worried me very much. Now, do I understand in generating the franchise you confer the right to the plant to engage in a business also?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We have nothing to do with that. We can not decide what we shall do.

Mr. FOWLER. The generator of the power may do that—the owner of the power. Now, I would like to know, as the gentleman seems to be well informed, as to what the United States will have to do at the end of the 50 years in order to take over this hydraulic power plant?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We have to give one year's notice in order to take it under the bill as it stands. Then we will have to pay the fair value of the property, except those——

Mr. FOWLER. I understand that; but now you have no limitation as to business operations, and I want to get this information, because I want to understand it. Suppose that power plant should engage in the manufacture of steel, the electric railways business, or furnishing of light by wires to a number of cities. How much of that property will the Government have to take over before it can get control of the water-power plant?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Well, that is a point which was raised by the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT]. My own judgment is this—and, as I say, it is a matter of construction—and my own judgment is the United States ought not to pay back more than that part of the plant that is necessarily connected with it for public use or which is essentially a part of the project, and without it the plant could not exist.

Mr. FOWLER. Your bill does not regulate that question, but it is broad. As I understand and the way I construe it it means that the Government must take over all of the business connected with the power plant.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; only that directly connected with it, as I stated, for the public use or the essence of its creation.

Mr. FOWLER. Then that really will force the Government to go into ownership of private business, will it not? and the Government does not want to do that.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Some gentlemen want to do it, and this might be a good way to start. That is not what we have in mind. We believe this provision is necessary for adequate development.

Mr. FOWLER. It would result in a perpetual lease of the property.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No——

Mr. FOWLER. It would mean one of two things—either a perpetual franchise or Government ownership and operation of private business by the Government.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman misapprehends the condition. If he will allow me to state it——

Mr. FOWLER. I will be glad to do that.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. This term "at the end of 50 years" is an indeterminate term. You may call it "perpetual," but that is not the proper designation of it. It is an indeterminate term. It is practically the same term as is used in the States. The sovereign has the right at any time after 50 years on one year's notice to terminate the term and acquire that property and whatever is necessary, connected with the project, and used for the public benefit, or essential to its creation and existence. I think that is what the bill tried to cover.

If we have not covered it, then we are unfortunate; but that is what our idea was in having that section framed, so that that indeterminate term would continue, and so that the public would be sure of its service, so that the development should progress to the utmost efficiency. If the Government determined it wanted it at the end of the time, or at any time thereafter, it could step in on a year's notice and take the plant itself, and only that part connected with it that is necessarily incident for the public use, on its creation and continuance.

Mr. FOWLER. If the Government were only required——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That might not cover the steel plant, or it might, under some circumstances. It would depend on conditions.

Mr. FOWLER. To pay the expense of the construction of the dam would be a different proposition, because that is the generating force, but here is the operating force, or the means by which the business of the company is done, and if we must take it over, then that forces us into Government ownership and operation of business, which is not desirable from my point of view, and, I think, in the end it amounts to a perpetual lease.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. As I said, the indeterminate term is the one usually used in the States. It is not called a perpetual lease there. It has worked well so far, and I fear the gentlemen are more apprehensive than necessary, after the experience of the States.

If the committee will allow me I will try to discuss, as briefly as I can, the question of taxes and charges. Quite a number of gentlemen have cited the Chandler-Dunbar case, in which a rule was laid down by which it is claimed that the United States has the utmost authority to do as it pleases in a navigable stream, to make charges and collect taxes, or do anything it sees fit. I think these gentlemen are entirely mistaken as to the scope of the decision in that case.

The Chandler-Dunbar case does not do anything at all of that kind. As we understood up to the time of the decision of the Chandler-Dunbar case, the law as laid down by our own Supreme Court, and practically by the supreme court of every State in the Union, was this: That the United States has no property rights in the water of navigable streams; that the water, so far as there can be ownership, is owned by the State in trust for public use, not for private sale; that the United States has only the paramount right to use that water for navigation. That is its sole right and power as a sovereign. It has no right to charge for the use of that water, because it does not own that water and has no property right in it. It has no property interest in it. The Chandler-Dunbar case only follows the same doctrine laid down as, I think, very much more clearly, in the Scranton-Wheeler case, in the One hundred and seventy-ninth United States Reports, I think. Now, those two cases laid down this doctrine, and I will outline it so that the members of the committee can understand it, and you will see for yourselves what the Supreme Court decided.

CHANDLER-DUNBAR CASE.

Congress passed an act declaring that part of the Soo River in Michigan and all property within it between this point here [designating it]—that is the ship canal—and that point at the other end of the aisle—that is the international boundary line [designating it]—is necessary for the purposes of navigation. Congress passed an act making that declaration. Chandler & Dunbar owned a dam or mill site and structures on it in the bed of the stream within that stretch of the river. The United States started proceedings in condemnation to acquire that property and pay fair value for it. The court held that wherever Congress determines that within definite limits of the river all property and lands and waters are needed for navigation between the high-water banks such right is paramount and supersedes all other rights, and that one who has any dam or structure in that bed of the river between the banks has no right to recover value for it, because it is an integral part of the river bed, which Congress has the paramount right to use for navigation.

And that is all the case decided with this single exception, that where the United States itself constructs a dam in a navigable stream, and, incidental to the construction of that dam, generates water power, it has the right to charge for the use of that power. Of course it has, because the dam is its own property, and the power is generated by the use of the property of the United States, just the same as the United States has the right to charge for the use of its own property anywhere. But the Chandler-Dunbar case does not go any further than in laying down those two points. The individual must only beware when the Government itself declares it wants to use the river bed and waters for navigation. That is the exercise of a sovereign right for a public use and no profit.

Mr. BURNETT. Is not that on the same theory and doctrine that the United States is then the riparian owner, just like an individual would be a riparian owner if he owned it individually?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman question the right of Congress in giving a grant to a company to build a dam upon a navigable stream, to put such conditions on that grant as it sees fit?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes, sir; I do question it, and that is exactly what I am coming to.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman must admit they must get the grant from Congress before they proceed?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Do you believe as a proposition of fundamental law that a grant that must be obtained before the grantee can go on, can not be made with such conditions as the grantor sees fit to make?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will discuss that very point. Yes, sir; I do; and I will read from the Chandler-Dunbar case to confound the gentleman. Congress in making a contract has a right to make any contract it sees fit, with this exception, and I will read from the language of the Chandler-Dunbar case, which these gentlemen rely upon. I read:

> The power to use and control comes from the power to regulate commerce between the States and foreign nations.

Now, that is the sovereign power to regulate commerce. Now note this sentence:

> All means having some positive relation to the end in view.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will continue, Mr. Chairman, for a few minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the gentleman from Minnesota will not trouble the Chair to call him down until he has finished his remarks.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The power to regulate commerce is the power that Congress has over use and control of waters and land under them, and is paramount to every other use or ownership. Listen:

> All means having some positive relation to the end in view which are not forbidden by some other provision in the Constitution are admissible.

That is the point. Anything that concerns the power of Congress to regulate commerce can be put into that contract. Anything that concerns the raising of money for the United States Treasury is a part of the taxing power of the Government and can not be put into that contract. I am reading from the Chandler-Dunbar case itself, which these gentlemen rely on. The point is this: Would you try to use the sovereign power of Congress to regulate commerce as a means to obtain money in lieu of taxation? You can not do it in that way. If you raise the money to put into the Treasury of the United States you can do it only under the Constitution of the United States in three ways. One way is under the taxing power of Congress, prescribed in the Constitution. The second way is by the use of the property of the United States, its public lands or dams, or whatever it may be; and the third way is by penalties for violation of the law.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to one other way by which the Government can get revenue, and that is by charging for a franchise.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. This is not a franchise.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. The gentleman said there were only three constitutional ways to get revenue—by taxing, by sale or lease of Government property, and by fines. I say there is a fourth way, well established and constitutional, namely, by the grant of public franchises. The currency bill, which the House passed and which the Senate passed, provided for revenue to the Government when the profits exceed 5 per cent or 6 per cent, whatever it was.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; we get sort of revenues in innumerable ways, and under inspection bills.

Mr. MANN. One way is by selling the credit of the Government.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes. But that is not a revenue. We get sort of revenues in numberless ways. But the theory of all these sovereign powers is that the revenues shall about equal the expense of enforcing that law. It is not the intent of the Constitution that the public expenses shall be paid except by the use of the taxing powers. It is so with the exercise of the banking privilege, and it is so with the exercise of the post-office privilege and the inspection privilege as to all sorts of products. The theory is that whatever revenues we get from the exercise of any of our sovereign powers are supposed to be about what it will cost to do the work in administering them, and I think the experience of our venerable friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE], who has had so much experience in connection with the taxing power of this Government, will vouch for this fact, that wherever the sovereign power of the Government is used to do anything and it is necessary to incur some expense, the expense has some relation to the cost of enforcing the law. It may be less, it may be much more, but it must have and does have some sort of a relation to the expense for doing the work. With the taxing power, of course, the principle is totally different.

TAX NOT COMMERCE.

Now, wherever in the regulation of commerce the United States does anything or requires anything to be done which incurs an expense, we compel those who seek the use of the power, such as those who build the dam, to pay for it. For example, we have four different classes of expenses in our bill: First, charge for inspection; second, use of flowage lands; third, use of public lands; fourth, expense removal. We think that is as far as we can constitutionally go. We think that if you go further, as suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] and my very good friend from Wisconsin—and I will reverse the order if you desire to have it done [laughter]—my impression is that that constitutes a charge or tax, which is the essence of taxation. The Supreme Court will look through all these subterfuges and find what is the essence of the things you do or seek to do; and the tax or the charge—call it what you please—is, in essence, a tax, and must be levied under the taxing clause of the Constitution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not doubt our authority to grant a franchise for the construction of a dam or to levy charges which require the grantee to spend money for the benefit of the United States, does he?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. What is the distinction between that and requiring them to pay money into the Treasury?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We do provide under our bill four different ways in which they are required to pay money into the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said a moment ago we have no constitutional power.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman must have misunderstood what I said.

Mr. MANN. Assuming that we have only the right of navigation over a stream—and that is all we have over these navigable streams where we do not own the property—and a man wants to build a dam there, do I understand the gentleman to say that while the man must get our consent we can not legally or constitutionally require him to pay us compensation for it, because that is an exercise of the taxing power which we are not authorized to make?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. In that way.

Mr. MANN. I know in that way, but that is a variation.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is right.

Mr. MANN. Now, if we can not sell our consent, how can we require the man to pay compensation in some other way?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We can tax him in any way we see fit.

Mr. MANN. It is not taxation under the taxation clause. It is another thing. There is a bill pending for taxation, as we taxed oleomargarine mainly out of existence, and we put a large tax on sulphur matches and taxed sulphur matches out of existence. But this is not under the power of taxation. We do this under the power to regulate commerce.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will read that sentence over again when the gentleman finishes.

Mr. MANN. Oh, you do not need to read it for my benefit. I am perfectly familiar with it. I do not think that relates to that question. That relates, as I read it, to the power we have the right to exercise in regard to navigation and commerce.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It applies to this very proposition. We have the right to do anything that we see fit in the way of regulation of conditions or contracts, as the court says, having some positive relation to the end in view—that is, the regulation of commerce—not the raising of revenue. Anything which concerns that we have the right to do, but if we do some other thing, to exercise some other sovereign function, that we have no right to do under the guise of a condition granting the right to place a dam in a navigable stream.

Mr. MANN. What is the end in view?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The promotion of commerce.

Mr. MANN. Not the "promotion" of commerce.

Mr. MADDEN. Regulation.

Mr. MANN. Affecting commerce——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It means the same thing.

Mr. MANN. No; because the construction of this dam may have the effect of preventing commerce. It is "affecting commerce," and the end in view is affecting commerce, and here the near end in view is the construction of the dam.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We have covered that by the fourth provision of section 4, but we declined to take the additional step that the gentleman has in view, because we believed that we had no right to do so. We investigated every possible way where the National Government could be affected, and where any right was exercised which required the Government to act, we compel them to pay for it. Where any property of the Government is used, we compel adequate payment for it. Where there may be a contingent liability against the Government, we compel that to be met. But we do not think that there can be a condition affixed to this grant of approval that money should be paid for it. The Government has no property right there. It has only the paramount right to use the waters and lands under them for the sovereign power of commerce. That is not a property right to sell. The property belongs exactly where it always has—the lands to the owners as the State law may prescribe and the waters to the State for public use. The United States may use all of them perpetually for commerce without paying a cent, but if it attempts to use them for any other purpose, as a dam to create power for an arsenal and the like, it must pay their value. If it uses them as an individual would, it must pay their value. If so, can it hold that the individual owner can not use his own lands or the State use its own lands and its own waters without paying a charge as a condition of consent of the United States, when the latter always has the right to use them for commerce without paying anything?

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to talk of power now, and not of the question of advisability. The gentleman has a lot of conditions in the grant that he proposes to give these companies, conditions that have nothing on earth to do with navigability. Yet the gentleman says that you can not put into the grant that the grantee gets, by which only he can build, a provision requiring him to pay money. I want to know the distinction.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think the gentleman will find that every condition in this bill has some relation to the structure itself that goes into that stream, or the commerce which is to be affected by it. We provide fishways in the structure. We provide lights on the structure. We provide for taking the structure. We provide that other structures similarly situated shall be cared for in the same way. Everything that we put in the bill has some relation to the structure, and all of it under the commerce clause of the Constitution. Anything that does not relate to the commerce clause of the Constitution has no relation to the end in view, as stated by the Supreme Court. That seems a clear distinction to us. It has been suggested that a condition would be valid to exact a charge and the revenues expended in improving the navigation of the stream. In principle that is equally vicious, unless some relation can be shown between the structure, its effects, and the work to be done. If such relation fairly exists, then a charge as a condition can be made, as we have tried to do as to the use of forest reserves and reservoirs. But if no such relation fairly exists, then it makes no difference, so far as power is concerned, whether the money is expended on this or some other stream, or on a public building, or to pay the salary of a consul in Africa. It stands on the same basis. For example, a dam is constructed on the Mississippi River at Lake Itasca, in Minnesota. Would it be valid to exact as a condition of approval by the United States that a charge might raise money for the removal of the jetties in the Gulf of Mexico? Certainly not. But if the dam caused a current or changed currents so that the channel was affected miles below or above, then I have no doubt that such a charge could be fairly made. That is the extent, to my mind, we can go, and that we have gone in our bill.

Mr. LIEB. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. LIEB. When the Government wants to erect a lock the first thing the Government does is to select the site and buy the ground necessary for the erection of the lock.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman refers to section 2, which I discussed.

Mr. LIEB. I mean the one you are now speaking about. The gentleman understands that any firm or individual that has permission from the Government to build a lock must first go to the owner of the ground before he can enter and operate upon the premises. I should like to know how a person or firm having a permit to build the lock could go upon the property of an individual without buying the site.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The bill provides that the owner may be paid before the Government gives permission. That is a part of the contract.

Mr. LIEB. The Government does not do that now.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, yes; that is the law.

Mr. LIEB. The Government buys all the sites.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, no.

Mr. LIEB. I differ with the gentleman. The Government buys all the lock sites.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Under the act of 1906——

Mr. LIEB. They have to buy them right along. Now, one other question——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I would like to yield to the gentleman, but I must finish my remarks.

Mr. LIEB. On a river like the Ohio River, for instance, where the land on one side is in one State and the other side is in another State, if a lock was erected or a dam constructed on the left-hand side going downstream, would the constructors not be permitted to take a man's property——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; under the fifth amendment to the Federal Constitution the Government or anybody else can not take private property unless for the public use and upon just compensation, except where Congress has provided, as in the Chandler-Dunbar case, that a certain stretch of the stream was needed for navigation between the high-water banks. In such stretches the United States can take the property without paying for it, and that is all.

Mr. LIEB. I want to get a clear understanding of what is meant by section 6. That section says:

> That the persons constructing, maintaining, or operating any dam or appurtenant or accessory works, in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be liable for any damage that may be inflicted thereby upon private property, either by overflow or otherwise.

Now, supposing the firm or company that was constructing the dam lived in another State. Would they have to go to that other State to sue?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; they must go where the land is situated, and the property rights are governed by the law of such State.

Mr. LIEB. Does not the gentleman know that $3,000 is the smallest sum for which the individual may sue in the United States court? Now, suppose the construction company should do $1,500 damage to a private individual's property.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, there are other gentlemen waiting to speak, and I am very anxious to conclude my remarks. All we can do is to relegate these people to the laws of their States where the lands are overflowed or used. They have a right to proceed under their State laws to get redress. Under our Constitution I doubt if we have any right to give them redress. We have no right to authorize condemnation in these cases. We do not pretend to do it. We only declare their legal rights in the States where the land is situated, and that is all we have attempted to do in that section.

Mr. LIEB. One more question.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It is of great importance to other gentlemen that I should conclude my remarks.

Mr. LIEB. One question on taxation, for information only. Supposing one of these dams was built on the Ohio River. Would not a county in Kentucky, on the left-hand side of the river going downstream, have the right to tax the property that was in that county?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, yes; unquestionably.

Mr. DONOVAN and Mr. ESCH rose.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I can not yield any further.

Mr. DONOVAN. You promised to answer my question before you concluded.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I do not wish to be discourteous, but some gentlemen have been promised the opportunity to make speeches this afternoon, and they have released them to the press, and it is unfair to them to take any more time. I thank the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I asked the gentleman if he would not answer before he completed his statement, and he said he would. He has not answered the question yet.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope the gentleman will answer the question.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. What is the question?

Mr. DONOVAN. In regard to the rates now charged by this Keokuk company.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will place in the RECORD a statement showing the reduction of rates. I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] proposes to place an exhaustive statement in the RECORD, but I have a statement showing how much the reduction has been, which I will also put in the RECORD. The gentleman from Iowa will discuss that further. When the bill is under the five-minute rule I will discuss section 11, giving the power to regulate rates, which is very important. I can not do it this afternoon.

REGULATION.

The committee realized that it was necessary to provide some regulations concerning the rates and charges to consumers of the current generated from these projects, and that it was of prime importance that these regulations should be as effective as possible. A statement of the situation will show what the committee had to consider, tried to do, and the result which might be expected from these provisions.

As we were informed, more than half of the current generated from these projects under this bill would be used by public utilities in public service and should be regulated in some way by public authorities as to rates and service. But we also know that a large proportion of the power plants generates the power in one place and sells it to a distributing company at some distant point, probably in the same State, but in many cases in some adjacent State. In comparatively few cases is the power generated and distributed by a company directly to the consumer. Of course, where the distributing company is only a branch or direct subsidiary of a generating company the same controlling authority can reach the whole process of production and distribution. But we are obliged to confront the situation that in a very large proportion of cases the current is sent to a distant point to its own power house and from there sold to only one customer, and by a bona fide sale. The result is that we are confronted with the problem as to whether the commerce clause of the Constitution could cover a current of electricity generated at one point and delivered to the same company at another point, thence to be sold, transformed, and distributed.

RECENT CASES.

But we are now convinced that the cases recently decided by the United States Supreme Court on June 22, 1914, the United States against Oil Companies, do authorize such regulations, even though the same company is the producer and the receiver, if the latter be for subsequent public use. But the authority of Congress can extend no further. If the current be sold by a bona fide sale to a customer doing business entirely in a State, the Federal authority can not affect or control such distribution. It does not seem that such doctrine could be questioned sincerely or intelligently, and yet several in the course of the debate based their arguments upon the assumption that such control, solely in intrastate business, should be exercised by Congress. Of course, such a proposition is nonsense, and the committee acted upon that assumption that our only jurisdiction was over interstate commerce. We have not yet superseded the Constitution.

CONTRACT RIGHTS.

But the second paragraph of the section directs the Secretary of War to include among the conditions of his approval a provision reserving his right to regulate and control as though the current entered into interstate commerce. This is a contract right, clearly subject to the police powers of the State in which the current is used. It is not a sovereign right to be exercised paramount to the State authority, but a contract right subject to State police authority. But until the State shall exercise its right this contract would seem to be valid and grant to the Secretary of War a large authority in the regulation of the use of electric current entirely within the State. That is the way we get at the problem. With this confronting the committee, we framed a provision based upon section 15 of the interstate-commerce act which has been in force since 1906 as a part of the Hepburn Act. This section provides for the method of regulating the services and rates of carriers in interstate commerce. We have paraphrased that section and apply it to the regulation and control of electric current in interstate commerce. There can be no doubt as to its constitutionality or efficacy, because it has been tested as has no other statute passed within the last decade, and within its limits it certainly will be effective.

PROPER OFFICIAL.

The Secretary of War is the proper official to receive this large power, because under the general law he is placed at the head of the War Department and would have the right to use his subordinate bureaus—the Corps of Engineers and the officers of the Judge Advocate General—in the administration of this provision. The Corps of Engineers is probably the best equipped of any bureau in the Government to do this particular work. It is composed of men of the highest character, training, and disinterestedness, and with peculiar experience adapted for this sort of public duty. The postgraduate course of the Engineering School at Washington trains the engineers in electrical engineering, and several of the engineers have received special courses in engineering at Cornell University and at the Boston Institute of Technology. As a result the United States Engineer Corps has quite a number of able officers ready to undertake this very important task.

The Judge Advocate General's office also has officers experienced in the legal phases of this service. For many years the United States has leased its surplus current from its military reservations wherever such can be done without interfering with private business. The Judge Advocate General's office has always supervised these contracts.

ADMINISTRATION.

The result would be, in all probability, the Secretary of War would appoint a board composed of officers of the United States Engineer Corps and Judge Advocate General's office to administer this law. Regulations could be framed and the board could have local sessions wherever public interest would require.

For many years the Secretary of War has had charge of the use and charges for use of bridges across navigable streams, and has had no difficulty in ascertaining all the facts necessary to perform this difficult duty. He is also obliged to enforce the law relative to the removal of obstructions in navigable streams, and in the administration of both of these statutes he has been required to ascertain all sorts of facts and to secure information from corporate interests which would be necessary to form the basis for his administration. There has been no difficulty heretofore in securing all of this information. So the committee believes that no additional powers were necessary other than those which have been exercised so successfully for many years and without any disturbance.

STATE REGULATION.

But the main purpose of the committee and its best belief was that the power of regulation of these public utilities could be best accomplished through the various State governments. Accordingly a proviso to the section prescribed that whenever a State provided adequate regulations as to rates, charges, and services which shall not be unduly discriminatory or unjust against the service or charges in any other State arising from the same project and this situation shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, then in such case the State authority shall be supreme and the Secretary of War shall not exercise the powers granted by this section.

The committee believes that this would encourage States to provide adequate regulation themselves and then no question could be raised as to the limit of authority of the Federal Government. The States could act and would regulate the whole use from the reception of the current to the smallest detail to the final consumer. This the Federal Government always can not do under its limited power except by means of a contract. But if the State shall not provide adequate authority the Secretary of War is given supervision and decision to protect the public interests under the provision of this section. Thus we have tried to meet this difficult situation to encourage the States, and yet protect the people against any default.

We believe that there is ample constitutional authority for our action in the regulation of these rates and service, local and national. For nearly a century the Supreme Court has held that where regulation of Congress is of only local interest and not of national scope, then the State authority shall apply unless Congress otherwise shall authorize and direct. Here, not only does Congress not interfere with State authority but provides expressly that it shall be effective. Under this doctrine we have given the States the right to adequately care for the whole situation, even though it be a regulation of interstate commerce.

This section has been severely criticized as being inadequate, half baked, and other epithets of that description. The gentleman who make them are not informed as to the limits of the constitutional powers of the United States and as to the actual course of business in the generation, transmission, and distribution of electric current. Your committee has endeavored to meet the situation as it is limited by our constitutional authority and by the actual business as it is done by the people in their daily life. Under these circumstances we are confident in submitting this section to the approval of the House. We do not grant more authority than necessary. But where long experience has indicated the limits to be fixed by a statute and the power which must be conferred, we have heeded such and confined ourselves and our work to the exigencies presented. We are confident the duties can and would be satisfactorily performed by what we have prescribed.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, at the request of my colleague, Mr. KINKEAD, to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating a short article referring to the establishment by the Washington Terminal Co. of a retirement plan for elderly employees.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCOY. The following is one of the number of articles that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD] has recently placed in the RECORD:

EMPLOYEES TO BE PENSIONED—WASHINGTON TERMINAL CO. ADOPTS RETIREMENT PLAN.

An old-age pension system has been established by the Washington Terminal Co., retiring employees at the age of 70, or those between 65 and 70, who are found incapacitated and who have been with the Washington Terminal Co. or railroads associated with it for more than 20 years. The terminal company has been in existence only since 1907.

The first beneficiaries will be retired August 1. They are Albert Banes, assistant postmaster, in service nearly 40 years; Richard E. Ball, blacksmith's helper, in service nearly 31 years; and William Wallace, cleaner, in service nearly 30 years.

Pensions are allowed on the following basis:

For each year of service 1 per cent of the average regular monthly pay for the 10 years preceding retirement; for example, if an employee has been in the service of the company for 40 years and has received for the last 10 years $80 per month, his pension allowance would be 40 per cent of $80, or $32 per month.

Acceptance of pension allowance does not debar beneficiary from engaging in other business, but such person can not reenter the service.

No person is to be taken into the service of the company who is more than 45 years old.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the Panama Canal, the greatest material achievement of the human race, is now a reality. It is owned and was built and paid for by the American people. For it we have expended approximately half a billion dollars. No other nation has contributed to its construction. No other nation has assumed any responsibility in relation to it. As it neared its completion this Democratic administration, in spite of platform pledges, in spite of the many promises made to the American people, in ignorance and fear, to buy influence and friendship, cowardly surrendered the right to pass American ships through our own canal without paying ourselves for that privilege.

Now, as a fitting companion to this policy of surrender and national degradation it is proposed that we apologize to Colombia, give her special privileges in the use of the canal, and pay her $25,000,000 as a balm for her lacerated feelings, caused by her failure to either blackmail the United States or to prevent the construction of the canal.

The proposed treaty with Colombia that this administration is insisting on being ratified not only provides an apology and cash to Colombia, but it further provides that Colombia shall have the right to pass her troops, her munitions of war, and her vessels through the canal free.

At the dictation of the President the Democratic Congress in cowardice, shame, and humiliation has just voted that we can not discriminate among nations in the use of the canal; that we can not even pass our own ships through the canal free without violating the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and without national dishonor. In his message to Congress on March 5 last the President declared that to pass our ships through the canal without the payment of tolls would be in "plain contravention" of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Again, he made the same statement in his speech on the Fourth of July, and yet we find him now urging a treaty to do the very thing that he has been denouncing and condemning Certainly if the Democratic contention be true, that all nations must be treated alike under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, we have no right to favor Colombia. The President urges that it is national dishonor for us to violate the treaty to favor ourselves, but that it is national honor to violate the treaty to favor Colombia. This contradictory attitude of the President I will not attempt to explain.

The history of the transactions in regard to our securing the right of way across the Isthmus of Panama for the construction of the canal is not complicated, but it is at this time extremely interesting and important. In 1902 Congress gave the President the power to enter into a treaty with Colombia, perfecting our right, under the treaty of 1846, to construct a canal across the Isthmus of Panama. In accordance with this action the Hay-Herran treaty was negotiated and ratified by the United States and submitted to Colombia for approval. Colombia was anxious at this time for the making of the treaty. She had urged us to make it and had eagerly approved its terms. Colombia under this treaty was to receive $10,000,000 and $250,000 per annum as long as we controlled the canal, and the right to pass her vessels through the canal free. This treaty could only be criticized in one regard, and that was in our anxiety to be fair with a weaker nation the United States was more than just.

Colombia at the time the treaty was submitted to her was in the absolute control, and had been for some time, of its President, Marroquin. He had been Vice President, but the constitution of Colombia provided that if for any reason the President was absent from the capital then the Vice President should perform his duties. Marroquin, being a student and a worshiper of the constitution, had the then President seized and imprisoned a few miles from Bogota, and then declared that as the President "was absent" from the city he himself, under the constitution, must perform the duties of President. This he proceeded to do. He also proceeded to make this "absence" of the President from the capital permanent, which occurred by the death of the President in 1902 in the prison where he had been placed by Marroquin. Then this great constitutional student, President Marroquin, discovered another provision in the constitution of his country to the effect that in case of a public disturbance the President could exercise legislative functions, dispense with Congress and the other coordinate branches of government, and become the absolute dictator of the nation. Having made this discovery, he at once caused some of his friends to "make a public disturbance," and promptly seized absolute power under this constitutional provision.

Whatever else may be said of this remarkable man, he was a great stickler for the Constitution.

In his love and reverence for the Constitution he is almost worthy to stand side by side with those favored protégés of this administration, those great patriots, Carranza and Villa. Constitutional government is dear to the leaders of this administration. It is well that they should now in state papers and on the Chautauqua circuit sing the praise of these great constitutional heroes. This administration is horrified by the bloody deeds of Huerta, but it believes in praise and apology and cash as a reward for the deeds of this constitutional dictator of Colombia, who secured his power by fraud and crime.

It will be well to remember that it was the liberty-loving, law-abiding, constitution-observing, mild-mannered man, Marroquin, that we were dealing with in attempting to make this treaty with Colombia.

For three years prior to 1903, the date of the declaration of the independence of Panama, no Congress had sat in Colombia, except the one called by President Marroquin to ratify the Hay-Herran treaty. This Congress was the absolute tool and puppet of the President. Circumstances compelled us to attempt to make a treaty with this man who by force and fraud had entirely usurped every power of the people of Colombia. The Hay-Herran treaty when first submitted to Marroquin was very acceptable to him, and he was anxious to approve it. But as he contemplated the $10,000,000 that he was to receive his cupidity and greed overcame his judgment.

The United States was going to pay the French company that had attempted to build the canal $40,000,000. Marroquin conceived the idea that either he could compel this company and the United States to pay large additional sums to have the treaty ratified or else by delay he could within the course of a year declare the rights of the French company forfeited, and thereby be able to seize the $40,000,000 the United States was to pay that company. With this plan in mind he tried to hide behind his sham Congress, the first that he had permitted to meet in more than three years. But his performance of calling the Congress was so transparent that it deceived no one. It was his Congress. He controlled every vote in it, and he could have adjourned it at any time and have taken the matter entirely into his own hands and have ratified the treaty himself if he had wished if Congress had refused to do what he directed. In fact, he did afterwards offer to do this very thing if the United States would not recognize the Republic of Panama and would give him another chance.

But, notwithstanding repeated and plain warnings from this country that serious consequence would follow if they refused to accept the treaty, the Colombian Congress after many weeks of pretended debate rejected the treaty by unanimous vote. They had mistaken generosity for weakness and believed that we would pay more rather than be defeated, or greatly delayed, in our mighty undertaking.

The people of Panama were greatly incensed at this action of Colombia. Panama was the State of Colombia in which the canal was to be built. It was the part of Colombia that would be most directly and greatly benefited by its construction. The building of the canal meant life or death to Panama. If the United States should construct the canal along the Nicaraguan route, it would be the end of the hopes of Panama. The people of Panama, knowing these things and realizing that Colombia had deliberately perpetrated this monstrous outrage upon her, rose literally as one man in rebellion and declared themselves free and independent. Colombia offered some show of resistance, but it consisted only of threats at Colon and a burlesque bombardment of Panama. The only bloodshed in the conflict was the killing of one man, a sleeping Chinaman, who was accidentally struck by a stray shell.

The Republic of Panama was established, and it was promptly recognized by President Roosevelt. This act of President Roosevelt was consummated with his usual promptness, decision, and patriotic foresight. In this act President Roosevelt performed one of the highest duties to his country and conferred one of the greatest of blessings upon this Nation and upon humanity in the history of the world. In future ages it will be forever a cause for grateful remembrance that we had a President at that hour who had the courage and the patriotism and the brains to do what was done. In all the splendid deeds that he has done none will add more lasting luster to the fame and name of Theodore Roosevelt than this act of his making certain the construction of the Panama Canal.

But now it is seriously proposed to reflect upon the author of this great achievement and to belittle and discredit the Nation by apologizing for what has been done and paying to Colombia $25,000,000 for failure to block this great work. We propose to apologize for what? To apologize for refusing to be blackmailed? For having the courage and ability to defeat a band of bandits? What are we to pay the $25,000,000 for? Why are we giving Colombia special privileges in the use of the canal? For not being able to rob us? We propose to pay $25,000,000 to heal the wounds of Colombia for her failure to seize the $40,000,000 belonging to the French company and involve us in trouble with France. It is precisely as if a highway robber who had suddenly been struck down by his victim whom he holds up at the point of a revolver would come into court and ask to be paid for the swag that he lost and for the mental and physical pain and anguish that he had suffered.

Who ever heard of a thief acquiring title to stolen goods by apologies to the rightful owner? Who ever before heard that a robber could acquire right and title by forcing his victim to take such compensation as he saw fit to offer? If we acquired the canal strip by either force or fraud, then we have no right or title to it whatever. If we did not get it honestly and fairly, then we should return it to its rightful owner. This would be consistent with national honor. But we would not restore national honor nor acquire rightful possession by apologies and dollars.

But it is charged that the United States, or its citizens, assisted in fomenting the rebellion of Panama. Suppose that we did do this—which we did not—in view of her actions has Colombia any right to complain? Suppose that we did, does it lie in the mouth of this administration to criticize such action? How many times have we been entertained by those now in authority with noble declarations about constitutional government and the rule of the people? We have been repeatedly told that 85 per cent of the people of Mexico were not in sympathy with Huerta and that they had no part in the Mexican Government. Therefore there was no government in Mexico that we should recognize and none worthy the support or the loyalty of the Mexican people. Yet the people of Panama had no voice whatever in the Colombian Government and had not had for some years, for that Government was controlled absolutely by one man who had acquired his power by force and crime. The highest interests of Panama were entirely disregarded by this greedy and crooked usurper. The people of Panama were unanimously in favor of rebellion and in favor of independence. If the consent of the governed is a requisite, then Colombia had no claim whatever upon Panama. If ever in the world's history a rebellion was justified, it was that of Panama, not only for its own benefit but for the benefit of humanity. The people of Panama rebelled. They set up a new republic. They had been at all times urging Colombia to ratify the treaty with us. They had always been friends of the United States. Should we then have turned upon our friends and helped those who had sought to rob us?

If Panama had not rebelled, I believe we would have been fully justified in proceeding to build the canal in spite of Colombia without further delay and without further negotiations or treaties with her. This, I understand, was the attitude of President Roosevelt and the course that he proposed to pursue. I think he was right. I believe the world would have justified such action. Under the treaty of 1846 we had the right to insist that Colombia consent to a reasonable treaty. Our efforts to secure a treaty with Colombia were entirely different from what such an attempt would be under ordinary circumstances. Colombia was in honor bound under the treaty of 1846, as well as by a proper regard for the rights of mankind, not to reject the treaty as she did. Her manner of rejecting it clearly showed that she intended to block the construction of the canal indefinitely or extort the price she had demanded. For more than 50 years Colombia had been told by this Nation that she would not be permitted to do this. One of the express conditions of the treaty of 1846 was that the United States should have the right to keep the Isthmus free and open for traffic, and in return the United States was to guarantee the sovereignty of Colombia over the strip against all other nations of the world. It had been the opinion of highest authority ever since the making of the treaty of 1846 that that treaty gave us the right to construct the canal, and that it would be a violation of that treaty for Colombia to refuse to enter into a reasonable agreement for that purpose.

In 1858 Secretary of State Cass declared, in speaking upon this question, that the Governments in possession of the Isthmus did not have the right "to close the gates of intercourse of the great highways of the world and justify the act by the pretension that these avenues of trade and travel belong to them, and that they choose to shut them." That was our position from that day until now, or at least until this administration came into power. Colombia understood our position absolutely. Our position was right when Secretary Cass asserted it, and it is right to-day. Colombia by her rejection of the treaty raised the question squarely as to whether or not she had the right to close this "great highway of the world."

Three things were certain: First, that a private company could not construct the canal. Second, that the United States would not permit any European power or powers to construct it. Third, that the United States alone could construct it. Under these conditions Colombia had no right, in order to extort money, to attempt to indefinitely delay this undertaking.

It was fortunate for all the world that Panama rebelled and saved many troublesome problems and complications that might have arisen. Panama by that act not only blessed herself, but civilization. I wonder if this administration would, if it could, again place Panama under the greedy control of Colombia.

I wonder if this administration would, if it could, again place Panama in the power of that usurper, criminal, and great constitutionalist, Marroquin.

For the first time in her 400 years of troubled and perturbed existence, since being independent and under the powerful guiding hand of this Nation, Panama is enjoying a period of peace and prosperity.

The act of prompt recognition of Panama by this Nation brought peace and saved war between that country and Colombia. It was better for Panama and it was also better for Colombia. It was better for the civilized world. That this is the belief of other nations appears by their approval of our course and by their prompt recognition of the new republic.

But did the United States encourage or take part in the Panama rebellion in behalf of Panama? It has been attempted to show this was a fact, because American vessels were at that time at Colon, but it was not only proper for the Government to have war vessels there at that time, but in view of existing conditions and our duties on the Isthmus under the treaty of 1846 it would have been criminal neglect for us not to have had a force in that vicinity to protect the Canal Zone. The only mistake that was made in this matter was in not having a larger force. This mistake almost caused fighting and bloodshed. Everyone knew who gave any attention whatever to the matter that Panama would probably secede if the treaty was not ratified. Our minister at Colombia had reported to the State Department months before that this would probably occur. Later he reported that representatives of Panama in the Colombian Congress had become largely indifferent as to the fate of the treaty, for the reason that they were convinced that Panama would secede if the treaty was rejected. Again our minister at Colombia, on September 15, 1903, called attention to the fact that Senator Obaldia had been appointed governor of Panama; that Obaldia was a "separatist," and that if the treaty failed Panama would at once set up a separate government. The newspapers of the country for weeks had carried articles saying that Panama would at once rebel if Colombia failed to ratify the treaty. Under such circumstances, this country would have been justly charged with criminal negligence if we had not taken notice of these conditions and prepared for them. Four hundred Colombian troops came to Colon, and their commander threatened to kill every American in the city. Serious trouble was only averted by the landing of a body of our marines.

There was no reason why any American should help to stir up trouble. It was entirely unnecessary. Panama for weeks had been ready to declare her independence, and was only waiting for the final rejection of the treaty to consummate her plan. President Roosevelt in his message to Congress January 4, 1904, said:

> I think proper to say, therefore, that no one connected with this Government had any part in preparing, exciting, or encouraging the late revolution on the Isthmus of Panama.

Secretary John Hay on January 5, 1904, in an official communication said:

> Any charge that this Government or any responsible member of it held intercourse, whether official or unofficial, with agents of revolution in Colombia is utterly without justification.
> Equally so is the insinuation that any action of this Government prior to the revolution in Panama was the result of complicity with the plans of the revolutionists. The department sees fit to make these denials, and it makes them finally.

In a later communication Secretary Hay made the following statement:

> The Isthmus was threatened with desolation by another civil war; nor were the rights and interests of the United States alone at stake—the interests of the whole civilized world were involved. The Republic of Panama stood for those interests; the Government of Colombia opposed them. Compelled to choose between these two alternatives, the Government of the United States, in no wise responsible for the situation that had arisen, did not hesitate. It recognized the independence of the Republic of Panama, and upon its judgment and action in the emergency the powers of the world have set the seal of their approval.

I place the facts known to all the world and the statements of these two eminent Americans against the suspicions and insinuations of that class of self-confessed superiority, that righteous breed of "high-brows," who are forever seeking to show the dishonor of their own country.

While Panama was a State of Colombia the control of Colombia over it was little more than nominal. It was always in a state of turbulence and rebellion. During the 57 years before Panama became a separate Government there had been on the Isthmus 53 outbreaks, consisting of riots, disturbances, and rebellions. Some of these disturbances were of considerable magnitude. One rebellion lasted more than a year. Another lasted three years. During that period of 57 years the United States intervened six times to restore order and to protect traffic across the Isthmus. Four times during that period the Republic of Colombia asked the assistance of the United States in keeping order on the Isthmus. In view of the fact that revolution was chronic, that rebellion was almost annual, how can any sane and sincere man contend that it needed American influence to foment rebellion? At the time it came the very life of Panama was at stake. Why, then, would it need encouragement to cause her to attempt to secure her independence when she had been willing to do this many times before when the reasons were comparativly insignificant?

Summing up, there can be no doubt that Colombia, although she had sought the treaty, deliberately and for the sole reason of extorting more money, either from the United States or the canal company, refused to ratify the treaty.

It is perfectly clear that Colombia hoped to delay the ratification of the treaty until she could find some pretext to declare forfeited the rights of the French company and then seize the $40,000,000 that the United States proposed to pay to that company. This criminal greed, if consummated, would have led to serious trouble and would undoubtedly have caused complications with France, with the probability of indefinite delay in securing the right of the United States to commence the construction of the canal.

The result of this bad faith and dishonesty on the part of Colombia was to threaten the complete ruin of Panama and forever destroy her hope of having the canal constructed through her territory.

The calling of the Colombian Congress for the purpose of ratifying the canal treaty was mere sham and pretense, and the treaty would have been ratified if the President of Colombia had desired it.

Panama, outraged by this monstrous injustice of Colombia, made it plain to the whole world that if Colombia rejected the treaty she would declare her independence. Fifty years of rebellion, riot, and disturbance showed that Panama had little regard for Colombia, and it also showed the weakness of the control of Colombia over Panama.

Panama did rebel. She was fully justified in so doing. The United States immediately recognized the new Government and made a treaty with it, giving the United States the right to construct a canal across the Isthmus, and then and there forever settled one of the greatest questions in the history of the human race.

Colombia had violated the spirit of the treaty of 1846. She rejected the very treaty she had sought. She showed bad faith and dishonesty. She attempted coercion and blackmail. She dishonored herself, played false with the United States, disregarded the interests of the civilized world, and threatened the complete ruin of Panama.

The people of Panama had always been our friends. She had always treated us fairly. She had kept the faith.

But now, Colombia and her friends insist that it was our duty to have turned our guns upon our friends and have rewarded our enemies; that attempted blackmail should be rewarded; and that the effort to block the construction of the canal should be praised and paid for.

What is there about the record in relation to securing the right to construct the Panama Canal that should call for apology? What is there in that record that should make any real American feel ashamed? What is there in that record that should call for a gift of $25,000,000? What is there in that record that should call for special privileges to be given to Colombia in the use of the canal?

If Panama had needed our help to be free we would have been fully justified in giving it. Fortunately this necessity did not arise. Fortunately for herself, for the nations of the whole world, Panama took her place among the family of nations. Fortunately, at that time, we had a President who had the courage, ability, and patriotism to do his duty in spite of timid friends and designing enemies. He may be criticized now by some who belong to that class who believe it shows mental superiority to be ever against your own country, but he will be fully vindicated by the verdict of history. By his act the dream of 400 years was to become a splendid reality.

It would indeed be a fitting climax to a discreditable foreign policy should this administration that has surrendered the Panama Canal to purchase the friendship of Great Britain and the influence of the transcontinental railroads; that practically caused this great Nation to declare war against an individual; that still continues its stupid, vacillating, and blundering foreign policy, now add to this policy of weakness and surrender the additional degradation of having this Nation apologize for defeating an attempt at blackmail and pay the nation that failed in its criminal undertaking $25,000,000 "to help the hurt that honor feels."

Nothing in all the history of this Nation has paralleled the public reasons of the Secretary of State for the ratification of the pending treaty with Colombia, except only the ones given in the message of President Wilson urging the surrender of the canal to Great Britain and the transcontinental railroads.

Mr. Bryan says, speaking of the Colombia treaty:

> It does not matter which party was at fault.

The President said, in speaking of the canal surrender, that we should do it "ungrudgingly."

Mr. Bryan said, speaking of the treaty:

> Colombia feels aggrieved, and whatever may be said as to whether or not this feeling is justified, we should give the price that she asks.

The President said, in regard to the surrender of the canal, we must do this thing "without asking whether it is right or wrong."

We are rich and prosperous, and if our money holds out we will finally buy the friendship of the world, if this Democratic policy is continued. How much better is the Nation that, "right or wrong," purchases peace and good will than the one that sells it?

Both the President and the Secretary of State seem to think that they owe no greater duty to their own country than they do to other nations of the world. They both preach that we should, for the sake of friendship, yield to foreign demands, whether they are "right or wrong." This does not square with the belief or the action of other men or of other nations. It does not follow the divine declaration—

But if any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel.

Would that some of this robust, red-blooded, divine doctrine could be instilled into this anemic, weak, feeble, faltering, anile administration!

During this administration a giant banner should be stretched from the White House to the office of the Secretary of State, and written thereon in letters large enough for the whole world to read should be these words: "Our foreign policy: Pay, Apologize, and Surrender."

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, do not do that.

Mr. MURDOCK. There is no quorum present. There are only 23 Members by actual count.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I could get no intelligent question answered, and here we are listening to a lot of foreign matters. I could not get my question answered from an intelligent Member, and I do not feel like sitting here and listening to these matters which are entirely foreign to this subject.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would like to state to the gentleman that we have promised that some pension legislation shall be disposed of this afternoon.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, at the request of others I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF].

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, the conservation bill—H. R. 16673—that will soon be offered by the Committee on the Public Lands for consideration marks a long, long step in the right direction. I believe an earnest and honest effort has been made to conserve the interests of the public. However, it is impossible, I think, to successfully draw measures of this kind without having definite information at hand relative to the conditions existing in every State in the Union. It is necessary, I believe, that the committee having this work in charge should have a knowledge of the provisions of the laws of the various States. Without this knowledge, and without the knowledge—which, of course, no man can have—of just what a State proposes to enact in the way of laws controlling public utilities, it is impossible to draft a law that will absolutely meet the needs of the people in the various sections of our country, unless Congress reserves the right to see that projects developed under leases granted under the provisions of this act are properly regulated.

INADEQUACY OF PROPOSED BILL.

As I have said before, Mr. Chairman, I believe an earnest and honest effort has been made by the Committee on the Public Lands to draft a measure that would absolutely protect the consumers in the various States, but careful scrutiny of H. R. 16673 exemplifies the fact that the committee did not have at hand the information such as I have suggested. Section 9 of the bill provides:

That in case of the development, generation, transmission, or use of power or energy under a lease given under this act in a State which has not provided a commission or other authority having power to regulate rates and service of electrical energy and the issuance of stock and bonds by public-utility corporations engaged in power development, transmission, and distribution, the control of service and of charges for service to consumers and stock and bond issues shall be vested in the Secretary of the Interior or committed to such body as may be authorized by Federal statute until such time as the State shall provide a commission or other authority for such regulation and control.

You will notice that the section provides that "in a State which has not provided a commissioner or other authority having power to regulate rates, etc.," then only shall the right to regulate be reserved to the Federal Government. It matters not that the laws in most of the States having such a commission are drawn solely in the interests of the operating companies and not at all in the interests of the consuming public. The right to regulate, under the bill as presented to the House, is transferred for all time to the State authorities.

This is the only section of the bill that attempts to control the regulation of such public-utility corporations in the States, and this section does not insure protection in any way to the people living in States having a commission with authority to oversee the actions of such corporations. It instead turns over to such State commission every authority in the premises, not reserving to the Secretary of the Interior, or some other official or body, as it should, the right to determine for the Government whether or not the State laws are such as to insure fair treatment to the public.

THE REMEDY I PROPOSE.

Mr. Chairman, when this bill is being considered in the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule for amendment I propose to offer the following substitute for section 9:

"That in case of the development, generation, transmission, or use of power or energy under a lease given under this act in a State which, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, has not provided a public-utilities commission or other authority with sufficient power to regulate, in the interest of the consuming public, rates and service of electrical energy and to supervise and control the issuance of stocks and bonds by public-utility corporations engaged in the development, transmission, and distribution of power in said State, then and in such case the control of service and of charges for service to consumers, and of stock and bond issues, shall be vested in the Secretary of the Interior or committed to such body as may be authorized by Federal statute until such time as the State shall provide a commission or other authority for such regulation and control which shall have such power."

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. In whom does the gentleman lodge this supervisory power?

Mr. WOODRUFF. The right to determine the adequacy of the State law will rest entirely in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MURDOCK. But all the other powers in this bill are put under the supervision of the Secretary of War.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman has in mind the Adamson bill, while I am speaking of the Ferris bill.

This amendment, if adopted, will absolutely reserve to the Government for all time the right and the power to fully protect the consuming public in all communities where hydroelectric energy may hereafter be generated under the provisions of this act, and should by all means be adopted as a part of this bill.

The committee, it seems, has presumed that any State undertaking regulation would see to it that the laws were such that these corporations would be properly regulated. The committee has not taken into consideration the immense political power wielded by such corporations in the several States. It evidently does not appreciate the fact that in some States to-day there are laws upon the statute books that could justify one in thinking that such laws were either written by the attorneys of the corporations or submitted to them for approval. The committee did not understand, I think, the extreme difficulty that would be experienced in many of the States in amending these laws so as to properly safeguard the interests of those States. I have in mind particularly the State which I have the honor to represent.

COMMONWEALTH POWER CO. AND MONOPOLY.

In the State of Michigan we have a corporation known as the Commonwealth Power Co., which has sought and is still seeking to control every kilowatt of electrical energy generated in that State. To accomplish this they have not hesitated to resort to methods that should condemn them in the minds of every honest man. They have left no stone unturned to prevent competition in the development and sale of electrical energy. Their engineers have surveyed the more valuable streams of the State, and on such streams as they feel it is not necessary to develop at this time it is known that they have bought up lands that it would be absolutely necessary to own in order to develop the same, thereby preventing any rival firm or corporation from developing such water power, completely shutting out competition. I know of only one exception to this rule, and I have in mind the Tittabawassee River. It seems that another firm had discovered the possibilities of this river in connection with the development of water power and had taken steps to secure the land necessary for development prior to the time the Commonwealth Power Co. recognized its importance. The former company was under contract with my home city to develop this stream, generate the electricity, bring the same to Bay City, and deliver it at our switchboard in the city at the rate of eight-tenths of a cent per kilowatt hour.

Several of the most eminent engineers in the country had gone over this stream, and each and every one had pronounced the proposition entirely feasible and good from a business standpoint. They could figure to a dollar what the cost would be to build the dams, install the machinery, and build the lines into Bay City. They knew what the lands would cost that would have to be bought before the dams could be built, for the developing company had options on or owned outright every foot of land necessary. They knew how much it would cost to operate and how much electrical energy could be developed. The company had an ironclad contract with Bay City to take every kilowatt at a certain definite price, and as the municipality was entirely responsible the Tittabawassee company could show to a cent, almost, what the profits would be each year. There were none of the uncertainties of business usually connected with the operation of concerns doing a retail or distributing business. There would be no loss of a small account here and another there. There would not be the expense of keeping in repair and good condition a complicated distributing plant. So it can readily be seen that under ordinary circumstances there would have been no difficulty whatever in financing this company.

COMMONWEALTH RESORTS TO COURTS TO ELIMINATE COMPETITION.

But for many years past Bay City has had a municipal electric-lighting plant, and the same has shown a profit at the end of each fiscal year. The Bay City Traction & Electric Co., a subsidiary of the Commonwealth Power Co., has for a number of years attempted to do away with the competition afforded by the municipal plant. It is common knowledge that machinery used in the generation of electricity becomes obsolete as quickly, perhaps, as machinery used in the production of any other one thing, and during the years that the municipal plant had been in operation it naturally followed that the machinery had become obsolete, so it was proposed to bond the city for a reasonable sum for the purpose of rebuilding the plant and putting it upon an up-to-date basis, with the object of producing electricity at a greatly reduced cost, thereby enabling the consumers to receive this service at a more reasonable rate. The Bay City Traction Co., which is a taxpayer in the city, took this matter into the courts as a taxpayer, and, on a technicality, prevented Bay City from even submitting the proposition to bond to the people. There was only one thing to do, and that was to allow the profits of the department to accumulate until such time as there were enough funds on hand to rebuild the plant. In the meantime the Bay City Traction Co. had been operating with the most up-to-date machinery; but at no time had they sold their output to the people at a less cost than did the municipal plant.

When it first became noised about that the Au Sable River was to be developed by the Commonwealth Power Co., it was inferred that the people living in that section of the State would receive current at a reduced price, owing to the ability of that company to produce electricity at a greatly reduced cost. Everybody supposed that the people would receive some benefit from the conservation of the power annually going to waste in the Au Sable River. Their dams were built, their wires were strung, and the current was brought into Bay City and into other cities in that section of the State. To this day, Mr. Speaker, there has been no reduction in the price of electricity to the consumer. We are paying as much to-day for our electricity as we did during the time when this company was compelled to generate its power by steam. The old, worn-out, obsolete machinery of the municipal plant was able not only to compete at a profit with this hydroelectric power but to actually sell at a less price than that asked by the Commonwealth Co.

COMMONWEALTH CO. PREVENTS FINANCING OF TITTABAWASSEE POWER CO.

I have stated, Mr. Chairman, that the Tittabawassee Power Co. had contracted with Bay City to bring their electricity to our switchboard and sell the same to us at the price of eight-tenths of a cent per kilowatt hour. With our old, worn-out, obsolete machinery in the municipal plant, with which it was possible to compete with the hydroelectric power developed on the Ausable, it cost us 2½ cents per kilowatt hour to develop. Realizing that if the Tittabawassee Power Co. was allowed to finance their project and fulfill their contract they would be compelled to sell their product at a reasonable profit, the Commonwealth Power Co. has gone into every money market, practically, in this country, and through their financial connections prevented the financing of the Tittabawassee Power Co. They were enabled to do this by the fact that they are directly or indirectly connected by a complete system of interlocking directorates with practically every hydroelectric developing or holding company and every financial institution that finances these concerns in this country. It was only necessary for the Commonwealth people to notify the different banking people that the completion of the Tittabawassee project would be an interference with their vested rights to make it absolutely impossible to finance this concern in the usual way.

It is a matter of record in the departments of this Government that while nominally many different companies are engaged in the production of hydroelectricity the actual condition is that they are all as closely connected as were the subsidiary companies of the Standard Oil previous to the dissolution of that company. These companies to-day form one of the most gigantic monopolies the world has ever known. They are swiftly and mercilessly crushing out competition everywhere by means no less unscrupulous than resourceful, and if it has been found impossible to finance an independent concern in Michigan it is not without the bounds of possibility that independent concerns in other localities are receiving similar treatment. The action of the Commonwealth Co. in this instance has been the means of denying to the people of my section of the State the privilege of enjoying the benefits of competition in hydroelectric heat, light, and power which by every right is theirs.

The Tittabawassee Power Co., Mr. Chairman, has entered into the contract with Bay City in good faith, being satisfied to sell to the city at a reasonable profit, and have agreed to dispose of their current to us for the extremely low price of eight-tenths of a cent per kilowatt hour, when it has been costing us 2½ cents per kilowatt hour to develop the same. And it is reasonable to suppose that if the Tittabawassee Power Co. can sell their product at eight-tenths of a cent per kilowatt hour and make a fair profit at that figure, the Commonwealth Power Co. could and would dispose of their product to the people of Michigan at a greatly reduced price from that they ask to-day if the laws of the State were such as to enable the railroad commission to really regulate this company.

There is a law on the statute books of Michigan, passed by the legislature of 1909, which gives to the railroad commission the power to fix the rates. This law provides:

"That upon complaint, in writing, by any city, village, or township, by its duly constituted common or village council or township board, or other duly constituted authority of such city, village, or township, relative to the price of the electricity sold and delivered in such municipality, the commission shall investigate such complaint, and may, by its agents, examiners, and inspectors, inspect the system and method used in transmitting and supplying electricity, and examine or cause to be examined the books and papers of such person, firm, or corporation pertaining thereto. The commission shall cause notices of such complaint, with a copy thereof, to be served on the corporation affected thereby, who shall have a right to be heard in respect to the matter complained of at a convenient time and place, to be fixed in such notice. After such investigation and hearing, the commission, within lawful limits, may by order fix the maximum price of electricity to be charged by such corporation; and the price so fixed, of which such corporation shall have notice, shall be the maximum price in such municipality until the commission shall, upon like complaint, or upon the complaint of the person, firm, or corporation engaged in furnishing such electricity, again fix the maximum price to be charged therefor. In determining such maximum price the commission shall consider and give due weight to all lawful elements proper to be considered, to enable it to determine the just and reasonable price to be fixed for supplying electricity in such municipality, including cost, reasonable return on actual value of all property used in the service, depreciation, obsolescence, risks of business, value of service to the consumer, the connected load, the hours of the day when used, and the quantity used each month: Provided, however, That the commission shall in no case have power to change or alter the price for electricity fixed in or regulated by or under any franchise heretofore or hereafter granted by any city, village, or township."

WATER-POWER LOBBY CONTROLLED LEGISLATION.

I would call your attention to the fact that in determining such maximum price the commission shall consider, among other things, "value of service to the consumer." And just why the members of the Michigan Legislature thought it necessary to specifically provide in this law that in determining the maximum price the railroad commission must consider the value of the service to the consumer is more than I can understand. It seems to me that any company would feel itself amply protected if the commission were instructed to consider only the cost, reasonable return on actual value of all property used in the service, depreciation, and overhead charges. This law could not have been drawn more favorable to the corporations if it had provided that the commission could consider only the wishes of the corporations themselves in the fixing of the rates, for the reason that under those circumstances they would only ask as much as they could get—no more, no less—and under the present law they can do precisely the same thing. This Michigan law, taken as a whole, is the most vicious of any of the State laws on this subject.

Mr. Chairman, it is a recognized fact that the value of any given commodity to the consumer is actually the amount it will bring. It seems somewhat difficult sometimes to fix values. A man would pay perhaps $10 for a glass of water in the desert—and it would be worth it. That would be the value of that glass of water to him. A glass of water in Washington is worth little or nothing. The Commonwealth Power Co. proposes to make Michigan an electrical desert and reserve to itself a monopoly of all electrical energy, and to exact from the people of that State the last pound of flesh in the way of charges for their output. Regardless of the cost of production, they propose to charge all the traffic will bear. The laws of the State of Michigan not only allow this, but actually aid and abet them in so doing. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that that law must have been written by the attorneys of the Commonwealth Power Co., for certainly no man having solely the interests of this company at heart could do other than subscribe most energetically to every word contained therein.

It is clearly shown in the contract offered to Bay City by the Tittabawassee Power Co. that hydroelectrical energy can be generated at a cost that would enable the other companies of that State to sell to the people at a price far below what it is being sold to-day and yet give the developing companies a magnificent profit. It is clear, also, that the Commonwealth Power Co. proposes to exact the last cent they possibly can from the consuming public of that State. And, too, it is clear that the laws of the State, as they are now written on the statute books, will not prevent such action; and I believe it is wise that this Government in enacting these conservation laws should reserve to itself the power to scan the laws in such States as have not and will not properly conserve the interests of the people and say to those States that unless this is done the Government itself will do it.

VITAL IMPORTANCE TO EVERY INDIVIDUAL.

This is a tremendously important thing, Mr. Chairman, for the reason that it affects directly, not only every manufacturing institution and every individual now using electricity for power, heat, light, or other purposes, but eventually it will directly affect all manufacturing institutions as well as every householder in the Nation. The time is coming when the people of this country will be compelled to depend upon the electricity generated by water power for power, heat, light, etc., for no man contends that the coal, gas, and oil deposits of the world are inexhaustible. And in enacting a law providing for leases covering the multitude of projects that will eventually be developed under the provisions of this act Congress should reserve to the Government the right for all time to not only assure the companies securing the leases a fair return on their investments, but absolutely fair treatment to the consuming public as well. This is of vast importance to the farmer, as well as to the man living in the city, for the time is coming, and not far distant at that, when we will see farm buildings lighted by electricity, farm machines operated by electricity, and the farmers of the Nation enjoying the pleasures and profits of modern electrical improvements. This time will come apace if they are enabled to purchase electricity, as they should, at a price that is really reasonable. In the cities electricity goes into the modest as well as the more luxurious homes, consequently this is a question affecting most vitally every householder in the Nation.

If by a proper supervision of these hydroelectrical concerns we can be instrumental in securing a reduction of the price now paid for the product of these concerns—and I am convinced, Mr. Chairman, that this can be done without preventing in any way the earning of a legitimate profit by the power companies—it means a very material saving to every individual purchaser of electricity. The streams of the world were never meant by an all-wise Providence to be used solely in the interests of any one particular class; but were intended to be used to benefit all alike, and the function of Congress in drafting this legislation should be to insure that this be done. We can not do this if we leave to the States, with their indifferent laws upon this subject, the power to forever say what the consumers shall pay and the corporations receive. To my mind the only solution of this problem is to specifically provide in this bill that the Government reserves to itself the right to scan the several State laws, and if it finds that they are not such as will enable the State utilities commission to fix rates in the interest of the consuming public, then the Government itself will do so through some duly authorized official or body.

I most sincerely hope that this House will consider favorably amendments looking to this result. It surely would do so if it would really conserve the interests of the people. No man, Mr. Speaker, objects to the earning of a fair profit by any business organization; but I object, and I believe this House objects, to any company or corporation being allowed to utilize the forces of nature in the interests, solely, of itself without consideration for the general public.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S POSITION.

In his message of April 13, 1908, vetoing a bill to extend the time for construction of a dam across Rainy River, President Roosevelt said:

"We are now at the beginning of great development in water power. Its use through electrical transmission is entering more and more largely into every element of the daily life of the people. Already the evils of monopoly are becoming manifest; already the experience of the past shows the necessity of caution in making unrestricted grants of this great power."

Again, in a message vetoing a bill to authorize William H. Standish to construct a dam across James River in Stone County, Mo., and to divert a portion of its waters through a tunnel into said river again to create electric power, he said:

"The bill gives to the grantee a valuable privilege, which by its very nature is monopolistic, and does not contain the conditions essential to protect the public interest."

In this message he sets forth most explicitly his reasons for believing that the Federal Government has the power to exact such conditions as it sees fit in the interest of the people, and says:

"Believing that the National Government has this power, I am convinced that its power ought to be exercised. The people of the country are threatened by a monopoly far more powerful, because in far closer touch with their domestic and industrial life, than anything known to our experience. A single generation will see the exhaustion of our natural resources of oil and gas and such a rise in the price of coal as will make the price of electrically transmitted water power a controlling factor in transportation, in manufacturing, and in household lighting and heating. Our water power alone, if fully developed and wisely used, is probably sufficient for our present transportation, industrial, municipal, and domestic needs. Most of it is undeveloped, and is still in National or State control.

"To give away, without conditions, this, one of the greatest of our resources, would be an act of folly. If we are guilty of it, our children will be forced to pay an annual return upon a capitalization based upon the highest prices which 'the traffic will bear.' They will find themselves face to face with powerful interests intrenched behind the doctrine of 'vested rights' and strengthened by every defense which money can buy and the ingenuity of able corporation lawyers can devise. Long before that time they may and very probably will have become a consolidated interest, controlled from the great financial centers, dictating the terms upon which the citizen can conduct his business or earn his livelihood, and not amenable to the wholesome check of local opinion."

The consolidation prophesied by President Roosevelt in 1909 is already an established fact, for by means of interlocking directorates, through the operating companies, holding companies, and financial institutions, practically every concern of any magnitude is directly or indirectly interested in every other. This is exemplified by the inability of independent concerns to finance independent projects, and already the generation and sale of electrical energy has become in every sense a monopoly.

President Roosevelt says further:

"I consider myself bound, as far as exercise of my executive power will allow, to do for the people, in prevention of monopoly of their resources, what I believe they would do for themselves if they were in a position to act. The imposition of conditions has received the sanction of Congress in the general act of 1906, regulating the construction of dams in navigable waters, which authorizes the imposing of 'such conditions and stipulations as the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War may deem necessary to protect the present and future interests of the United States. * * *'

"I esteem it my duty to use every endeavor to prevent this growing monopoly, the most threatening which has ever appeared, from being fastened upon the people of this Nation."

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, as though the wisdom of this great man is shown by the conditions that have developed since the writing of this message. And if we would do for the people what they would do for themselves were they here, we would reserve to them the right, through some authorized Federal official or body, to at all times supervise the actions of these corporations, whether or not they are doing an interstate business.

FINANCIAL POWER OF MONOPOLY.

In a diagram compiled by T. W. Norcross, Assistant Chief Engineer United States Department of Agriculture, Forestry Service, is shown two-thirds of all operating electric power companies in the Nation. This diagram shows that of these companies the following are connected directly or indirectly through interlocking or interconnecting directorates:

Adirondack Electric Power Corporation; Alabama Traction, Light & Power Co.; Albany Southern Railroad; American Power & Light Co.; Appalachian Power Co.; Arizona Power Co.; Arkansas Valley Railway, Light & Power Co.; Athens Railway & Electric Co.; Athor Gas & Electric Co.; Bangor Railway & Electric Co.; Bar Harbor & Union River Power Co.; Bellows Falls Power Co.; Blackstone Valley Gas & Electric Co.; Canadian Niagara Power Co.; Carolina Power & Light Co.; Central

In addition to the above, the diagram shows 11 other companies as independent. Each of these operating companies own many subsidiary local operating companies.

The boards of directors of these different operating companies are interlocked with the following holding companies, and no doubt the boards of directors of these holding companies are connected through other interlocking or interconnecting directorates with practically every financial institution of any magnitude in the country:

American Cities Co.; American Gas & Electric Co.; American Light & Traction Co.; American Power & Light Co.; American Public Utilities Co.; American Railways Co.; Atlantic Gas & Electric Co.; Augusta-Aiken Railway & Electric Corporation; Bangor Railway & Electric Co.; Cities Service Co.; Columbia Power, Light & Railways Co.; Commonwealth Gas & Electric Cos.; Commonwealth Power, Railway & Light Co.; Connecticut River Power Co., of Maine; Consumers' Power Co.; Eastern Power & Light Corporation; Electric Bond Deposit Co.; Electric Bond & Share Co.; Electric Corporation; Electric Investment Corporation; Electric Properties Co.; Electric Securities Corporation; Electric Utilities Corporation; Federal Light & Traction Co.; Federal Utilities Co. (Inc.); The General Gas & Electric Co.; General Electric Co.; Georgia Light, Power & Railways; Georgia Railway & Power Co.; Los Angeles Railway Corporation; Massachusetts Co.; Middle West Utilities Co.; The Mohawk Valley Co.; Mountain Power Co.; Montpelier & Barre Light & Power Co.; Municipal Service Co.; National Properties Co.; Nevada-California Power Co.; New England Power Co., of Maine; Niagara Falls Power Co.; Niagara, Lockport & Ontario Power Co.; North American Co.; Northern States Power Co.; Northwestern Power Co.; Pacific Gas & Electric Co.; Peoples Gas, Light & Coke Co.; Philadelphia Electric Co.; Public Service Corporation of New Jersey; Public Service Investment Co.; Public Securities Co.; Public Utilities Corporation; Puget Sound Traction, Light & Power Co.; Railroads & Power Development Co.; Railway & Light Securities Co.; Republic Railway & Light Co.; Securities Co. of New York; Securities Corporation General; Standard Gas & Electric Co.; Tennessee Railway Light & Power Co.; Union Railway Gas & Electric Co.; United Equities Corporation; General Electric Securities; United Gas & Electric Corporation; United Gas Improvement Co.; United Light & Railways Co.; United Properties Co., of California; United Railways Investment Co.; United Service Co.; United Utilities Co.; Utah Securities Corporation; Utilities Improvement Co.; Utilities Securities Corporation; Virginia Railway & Power Co.; Western Power Co.; Western Railways & Light Co.; West Penn Traction & Water Power Co.; Westinghouse Electric & Motor Co.; Wisconsin Edison Co. (Inc.); Wisconsin Securities Co.

It will be seen from these lists, and the probable other interlocking directorates with other financial concerns, that the power companies of this Nation to-day constitute one of the most gigantic monopolistic institutions the world has ever known, and the importance of proper regulation of this great organization can readily be seen. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have listened to some strange doctrine this afternoon. We have many Federalists in this House—men who have gone off after the new-fangled theories of new nationalism, and they call it conservation.

If our constituents at home could come here and see Members on this floor surrender day after day the rights that belong to the States, if they could see them enthusiastically advocating measures that strike down rights and powers that have belonged to the State since the foundation of the Government, they would be astounded and amazed.

Mr. Chairman, I am anxious to safeguard our natural resources and prevent them from being used to create a monopoly of any kind anywhere. I am also willing to do everything in my power to break up the monopolies already in operation in our country. I am willing and anxious to develop our wonderful resources. Nature's God has done a great deal for the South. He has placed within her confines some of the greatest natural resources in the world, and it is our duty to develop and utilize them to the greatest advantage, to harness water power now serving no purpose and going to waste, and to utilize these tremendous elements of wealth and power for the good of humanity. It takes capital to build locks and dams. It requires money and the disposition to invest it to build up a great industry anywhere. I welcome the capital and the men with the disposition to invest it for our benefit, and I am anxious that the investment shall be a safe and profitable one for those who come into our midst with their money. I want to say to gentlemen here that there is nowhere to be found a more attractive and inviting field to which capital can go for profitable investment than in the glorious South. [Applause.] Her marvelous resources are just beginning to be developed, and upon the stage of industrial development she has but sung her prelude. Her water power is unsurpassed by that of any country in the world, and yet, untouched and undeveloped, this tremendous power is serving no purpose but is singing the song of wasted strength as it winds it way to the sea. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we had an opportunity to build a lock and dam at Lock 18 on the Coosa River in my district, and by doing so we would have completed a project that would have made the river navigable for 30 miles. Congress granted permission to the Alabama Power Co. to build a lock and dam at Lock 12, and then it asked that Congress grant permission to build the same kind of dam and lock at Lock 18, and why, because it was found that the lock and dam at Lock 12 were not sufficient to do the work that the company had contracted to do and that it was necessary to have the other dam and lock to complete the project, and the request was purely and simply that Congress grant a permit to do at Lock 18 just what it had permitted to be done at Lock 12. And, Mr. Chairman, Congress did grant that permission, but President Taft, embarrassed by a new and fresh disciple of the doctrine of Federal conservation, was finally persuaded to veto the bill. The bill ought to have been passed over his veto, because its failure to become a law rejected a gift to the Government of $1,600,000, put a stop to a project that would have made the Coosa River, without cost to the Government, navigable for 30 miles, and struck down an industry that would have saved to the farmers of the South from $2 to $2.50 per ton on fertilizers, prevented industrial development in my district, and drove capital out of my State back into the Dominion of Canada. This project had in it many blessings for our people; it would make the Coosa River navigable for 30 miles and it would establish a very useful and much-needed industry. It would give employment to labor, cheapen fertilizers, and aid much in reducing the cost of production, increase the productive power of the soil, and provide the farmers of the South with fertilizers from a home industry instead of forcing them, as is now the case, to pay tribute money to the nitrogen monopoly of Chile. [Applause.]

And, Mr. Chairman, the Alabama Power Co. by the completion of this one project would have contributed more toward making the Coosa River navigable than the Government of the United States has contributed since the morning stars sang together. These innocent advocates of Federal conservation are not only standing in the way of industrial development in the South but they are hindering the work of navigation on one of the most important waterways in the United States. [Applause.] When permission was granted by Congress to build a dam at Lock 12 men had been induced to go into this enterprise, and money was obtained for this project under the provisions of the general dam act; and when it was found necessary to build another dam to complete the project the Alabama Power Co. simply sought to obtain permission the same as that which was granted under the powers of the general dam act with regard to Lock 12 and in operation when permission was granted to build the dam at Lock 12. The striking down of that bill by the veto of the President left an industry half finished and drove capital away that had come to establish in our midst a great fertilizer factory. This worthy project was hamstrung, this capital driven away, and this industry destroyed, all in the name of Federal conservation. Oh, conservation, how many an ignorant blunder has been committed here in thy name! [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, here is a picture of this great fertilizer factory that was to have been erected in my State; but it was not erected there. It was erected in the Dominion of Canada, beyond the confines and jurisdiction of these new conservationists. I am reminded of a report made by a register in chancery regarding a mill and a dam site. The mill had been washed away, but the dam remained. It ran something like this:

The dam is down by the mill site,
The water is still flowing on;
But the mill isn't there by a dam site,
Johnny, my old friend, John.

[Laughter and applause.]

So here is the picture of this great industry, but the industry is not in Alabama by the dam site [laughter], but it is in Canada.

Your doctrine of Federal conservation gives us the picture of an industry that your folly drove into Canada.

The gentleman from Illinois made reference to the gentleman from Sheffield, Mr. J. W. Worthington. I want to say in behalf of this gentleman that he is one of the ablest and best men in the country. He is an industrious, enterprising citizen, and for bringing capital into Alabama and building Lock 12 on the Coosa River, in my State and district, he has and holds the gratitude of the people of Alabama.

Mr. Chairman, Presidents and Secretaries of War have held since the foundation of this Government that the riparian rights along navigable streams were questions for the State, and the State alone, and it has long been held that the Federal Government had no power over or concern with the water flowing through a State in a navigable stream except as that water was used for navigation. Mr. Chairman, these questions were left for settlement by the State, and until this new school of statesmen came along the State was protected and safeguarded in the exercise of its rights and powers.

Mr. Chairman, the trouble with some Members of Congress is they soon lose their local touch and bearing and drift away from all notions of home rule and local self-government. They forget that there is such an institution as a State with rights and powers that the State, and the State alone, should have and exercise. If the men sent here from the States and honored with seats in this body are to surrender the rights of the State and follow this federalistic idea of allowing the National Government to exercise jurisdiction over, take charge of, and regulate everything, regardless of its State or Federal aspect, then it will not be long until the State will be shorn of its virile strength and power. [Applause.]

The governor will become a mere advisory head and the legislature will become a mere house of delegates, such as Territories are permitted to have before they are admitted into the Union. Mr. Chairman, some of these gentlemen misunderstand their mission here. They are not sent here to surrender to the Federal Government rights and powers that belong to the State, but it is the prime function of their office and their solemn duty to safeguard and preserve the sovereign powers of the States. [Applause.] Deprive the State of these powers and the State will be weakened and impaired. Let the State retain and exercise these powers. The power unused is the power that perishes. It is our duty to guard with increasing vigilance the State against every step of Federal encroachment. It is our duty to stand firm against every effort to crucify these sacred powers of the State upon the cross of Federal control. [Applause.] But some gentlemen never stop to think or to analyze the situation when conservation is mentioned in connection with a dam or a dam site on a navigable stream. They do not stop to consider what these federalistic tendencies will do to our splendid system of government if this Federal usurpation is tolerated. This new fad, noisily proclaimed by a few faddists, has worked untold injury to the cause of navigation in my State and industrial development in the South. Just mention conservation, then upon a wild and reckless rampage these disciples of conservation go pell-mell into the Federal Congress with measures that belong purely and wholly, singly and solely, to the State. They fall into the error of advocating action on measures here that should be settled by the legislatures of the States. Some of them by advocating Federal control display a disregard for the State and its institutions. They show plainly that they distrust the local forces of this Government, forces that supply the very lifeblood of the Government of the United States [applause], and when I hear them pleading for Federal usurpation of the States' rights and functions, I am tempted to inquire whether or not they are the real friends of the States from which they come.

Mr. Chairman, it is the duty of the statesman to understand the spirit and genius of our institutions and to properly interpret the Constitution, State and Federal; but if he be driven from his moorings by every fallacious impulse and fanatical theory that comes along, then representative government will disappear. Our great system of State and Federal Government will perish from the earth. Whither are we drifting? Every Government that has gone down in the long night of time perished not because stress and emphasis were laid on the primary and local units of its power, but because these were shorn of their strength, dwarfed and smitten sore by the rod of federal usurpation. If this Republic is to live, it must prevent, not encourage, Federal interference with the sovereign powers of the Commonwealth; it must guard with intrepid vigilance the civic life and honor of the State. [Applause.] It must not weaken or impair a single sovereign power vouchsafed to a State in this Union, but it must contribute to the strength and glory of every Commonwealth in the sisterhood, and then by the full and free exercise of their constitutional powers they will make perpetual this great household of sovereign States. [Loud applause.]

Here, Mr. Chairman, under leave to print, I submit these statements:

The bill granting a permit to the Alabama Power Co. to build a dam at Lock 18, on the Coosa River, was passed by the House on August 22, 1912, with a majority of seven votes. No one dreamed that President Taft would veto the bill, it being confessed even by many of the opponents of the bill that the project was most meritorious, and especially could the friends of the bill expect the President to approve the bill since the Chief of Engineers, in making his report upon the bill, said:

> It will be seen that the construction of this high dam by the power company will save the United States in initial cost the sum of $1,622,000, the interest on which, at 4 per cent per annum, is $64,880.

To the amazement of the friends of the bill, inquiry on the day following the passage of the bill through the House disclosed that the President felt he should veto the bill.

Senator BANKHEAD visited the President, and expressed to the President his great surprise that the President could for one moment consider vetoing the bill. The Senator urged upon the President that he, when Secretary of War, had in a number of official statements held the very opposite to the contentions and arguments of those who supported the new theories and new nationalism, and the Senator urged that the President could not consistently, in view of his past record and opinions upon the subject, veto the bill. The President replied to the Senator that he still held to his former views, but he said, "BANKHEAD, it is too late now for me to have a family row, and the Secretary of War insists upon a veto, and I am letting him handle the subject." In short, the Bull Moose Secretary of War shook his antlers and snorted at the President, and the President, rather than have a row, vetoed the bill, and the Coosa River in my district lost a navigation improvement that the Chief of Engineers said would cost $1,622,000, and that the Government would save $64,880 per annum, and my district and State lost a lime-nitrogen factory, the total cost of which as built in Canada is over $2,000,000. In fact, the total loss to the United States can be stated at not less than $4,000,000.

The total appropriations for the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio River system now amount to nearly $90,000,000. The Coosa River has received a total since 1875 of $1,535,344.89.

Summary of appropriations made by Congress for western land irrigation.

Early irrigation surveys	$350,000.00
Reclamation fund	79,450,438.53
Authorized under bond issue	20,000,000.00
Expended by Geological Survey	4,500,000.00
Expended by Department of Agriculture	956,000.00
Expended by or through Office of Indian Affairs	10,797,316.29

The gentleman from Wisconsin says that in 1913 there had been developed 2,711,000 horsepower, an increase of 900,000 horsepower in two years, and he says, "So we are doing pretty well with the legislation which we have, without making the grants to water-power interests contained in this bill." It is amazing that the gentleman from Wisconsin, with the easy opportunity for him to get at the facts, should make the statements that we are doing pretty well, and refer to an increase of 900,000 horsepower in the two years, when, as stated by the gentleman from Alabama in his speech on Saturday, only four important dams have ever been constructed by private enterprise in the navigable streams of this country. See page 13452.

The total development in these four dams is not in excess of 300,000 horsepower. That is to say, the gentleman from Wisconsin thinks we are doing very well when in the nonnavigable streams of this country millions of horsepower are developed under the laws of the States in which the developments occur. There is no distress or imposition upon the people, but prosperity and industrial achievement follows these developments; yet we do so well, according to the gentleman from Wisconsin, that with the millions of horsepower in the navigable streams of the country we have only developed by private enterprise 300,000 horsepower. It does appear that the gentleman from Wisconsin is such a grasping monopolistic conservationist that he even claims that the credit for the development of millions of horsepower in the nonnavigable streams of this country is due to Congress and to the policy of the Federal Government, when, as a matter of fact, the developments in the nonnavigable streams are in no respect whatever controlled or regulated by the Federal Government. The fact is that the 300,000 horsepower developed by dams built in the navigable streams of the country merely demonstrates beyond a question of doubt that the so-called conservation policy, of which the gentleman from Wisconsin is a shining light and advocate, has put a stop to the development of water powers in the navigable streams instead of encouraging these developments and conserving these natural resources.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] stated in discussing the subject with the gentleman from Wisconsin on Saturday that "it is not to be assumed that the Government will be unreasonable." Was the Government reasonable when its President vetoed a bill in which Congress granted the right to the Alabama Power Co. to build a dam in the Coosa River in my district, and by that veto drove the investment to Canada?

The gentleman from Wisconsin says he finds that in Ontario, Canada, where these people were driven to, leases are not made perpetual as provided in this bill, nor for even 50 years, but for 20 years. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will take the trouble to investigate the subject, he will find that the Ontario Power Co. has a perpetual right at its Niagara Falls, Canadian development, and the Ontario Power Co. contracted to furnish the American Cyanamid Co. the power for its new cyanamid plant at Niagara Falls, which plant went to Niagara Falls in Canada and was driven there, in fact, by the veto of the Lock 18, Coosa River bill passed in 1912.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that general debate has closed?

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no other speaker.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is on my list for some time if he desires it.

Mr. MANN. I just wanted to know if the general debate was closed. The Chair, without making any inquiry, directed the Clerk to read. I did not know whether that was by arrangement or not.

The CHAIRMAN. It was by arrangement.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is all right if the gentleman from Illinois desires time.

Mr. MANN. I did not care to consume any time. I do not think we ought to proceed with the reading of this bill under the five-minute rule without Members of this House having notice.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am not going to have read more than the first paragraph. Then I am going to move to rise. Let the Clerk finish the first paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the first paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 23, 1910, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 23, 1914, on page 12535, records the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, Mr. SIMMONS, joint author with Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, of the new tariff law, as saying:

> We are very familiar with the argument that was made with respect to imports when this tariff bill was up for consideration. We were told that we would be flooded with imports, and the countries from which we were told these imports would come were the manufacturing countries, not the agricultural countries. Nobody doubted our ability to protect ourselves when we made a good crop against the agricultural countries. Nobody raised very seriously the question of our ability to protect ourselves against these agricultural imports.

In the following paragraph he further states:

> Now, the fact is, entirely in line with the argument which I have just made, and supporting the statement which I have just made, that these importations were largely food products to supply a demand caused by the bad crops in this country; the increase in imports that the Senator refers to in the last few months, and which I admit, has come very largely from the agricultural countries and not from the manufacturing countries.

These two quotations contain some significant admissions. Notice he says: "Nobody doubted our ability to protect ourselves when we made a good crop against the agricultural countries." In other words, under the new law, or, for that matter, the old law, when we had a good crop we could protect ourselves against importations from agricultural countries; or when we had a bumper crop sufficient for large exports we could protect ourselves; but when our crops were short, and husbandmen, having devoted the same amount of labor, same amount of seed, the same amount of expense for harvesting and garnering a poor crop that they would have expended for a bumper crop, they should be placed in open competition with the outside world and no advantage given them by way of protection of price. The banker has the opportunity to increase his rate of interest when money is scarce. The producers of manufactured products protected under the present law can raise his price when the amount of his products are lessened or the demand increased. But the theory of this legislation is to give the farmer no advantage by way of price in this country when his crop is a partial failure over what it is for the same amount when the crop is a bumper.

You will notice he further says, "Nobody raised very seriously the question of our ability to protect ourselves against these agricultural imports." I presume by "nobody" he means nobody in authority now in this country, and certainly nobody on the majority side who were making this legislation "raised very seriously the question of our ability to protect ourselves against these agricultural imports." The facts are that the rights of the farmer were absolutely ignored in the make-up of the law.

Referring to the large imports, he says, as quoted above, "These importations were largely food products to supply a demand caused by the bad crops in this country—the increase in imports that the Senator refers to in the last few months, and which I admit has come very largely from the agricultural countries." It does not seem to concern the distinguished gentleman, but he apparently deems it proper that although some of the crops have been "bad" in this country in the last year that it is entirely proper that the decreased yield to the farmer should be followed by a decreased price for the product. I submit nine of the most important crop importations for the first eight months under the new tariff law and the importation for the same articles for the corresponding months of the old law, together with the prices paid the farmers throughout the country on June 1 and July 1 of the following two groups of years: First, 1913 and 1914 are grouped together, because the two months in both years were after the passage by this House of the Underwood tariff law. In the first, 1913, its anticipatory effects were largely produced, and in 1914 its actual effects were apparent. The second group I quote the 1st of June and the 1st of July prices for 1909, 1910, 1911, and 1912 as a group of years under the old law. I give the average for the two representative dates under the operation of the old law and the new, and the result in each is quite significant.

The table I submit shows what the loss of revenue would have been if the increase of importations noted had come in under the old law instead of the new.

The statement of the distinguished Senator amounts to almost an authoritative admission that the new tariff law, containing, as it does, the largest amount of additions to the free list recruited from farm products, and the greatest reductions made on other farm products, that the farmer's interest was entirely ignored and the burdens of the tariff legislation placed largely upon the farmer's shoulders, so that he alone of the toilers of the country should be subjected to unchecked competition. And that in case of a reduction of his product from whatever cause there could be no advantage in price accruing to him.

Imports into the United States of certain farm products for eight months, October, 1913, to May, 1914, inclusive, under the 1913 tariff act, compared with the imports of same products for the corresponding months one year earlier under the tariff act of 1909; the per cent of increase under the new law; the loss of revenue to the Government; the average farm price of these farm products on June 1, 1913 and 1914, compared with the average farm price on June 1, 1909, 1910, 1911, and 1912, together with the amount of decrease in price of the two-year period compared with the four-year period.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16053) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What is the request?

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand there are some other matters that will come up to-morrow, and it is not likely we will get in at all early with this bill.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that when the House puts in five or six hours of hard work that is about as much as you can expect to keep Members here for. Now, to-morrow it is the Indian bill and this bill; and when we have this bill up it will be under the five-minute rule. It will be a contest, and gentlemen will have to be here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] that I understand the Indian bill will not come up to-morrow.

Mr. ADAMSON. But the Agricultural bill will.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I will call up the report in the cotton-future bill to-morrow morning, if I may be recognized.

Mr. MANN. Well, gentlemen ought to be here for that, too. I am not willing to assume that nobody wants to be heard on those things.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BARTHOLDT, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. MCANDREWS, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement of Minister Dubois with reference to the treaty with Colombia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement by Minister Dubois about the Colombian treaty. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, was not that article printed a short time ago in the RECORD?

Mr. FOWLER. No; that was from Hannis Taylor.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think the gentleman will find it has already been printed.

Mr. FOWLER. I do think the article from Minister Dubois has been printed. The article from Hannis Taylor has been, I know.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REGULATION OF COTTON FUTURES—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. LEVER, from the Committee on Agriculture, presented, for printing under the rule, the conference report and accompanying statement on the bill (S. 110) to regulate trading in cotton futures and provide for the standardization of "upland" and "gulf" cottons separately.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], Does he intend to call up this conference report in the morning?

Mr. LEVER. No; I do not.

Mr. MURDOCK. Nor to-morrow at all?

Mr. LEVER. Nor to-morrow at all.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then we can go on with the general dam bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants the Members to know what will happen.

PENSIONS.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this is pension Friday, and I desire to call up two or three Senate pension bills.

Mr. MANN. Why does not the gentleman call up all four of them—I understand there are four—instead of two or three?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I will call them all up. I desire, Mr. Speaker, first to call up Senate bill 4969.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 4969. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the Clerk has no right to read the bill yet, so far as I know. May I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he ask unanimous consent to consider those four Senate pension bills in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that those four Senate pension bills be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] asks unanimous consent to consider the four bills which he names in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first one.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if this is not an error. I see in the report of the committee that it recommends the payment of this.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I will call the gentleman's attention to the committee report, on page 35, where the committee does not recommend the payment of the claim.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard upon the proposal to strike out this item.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, the soldier whom this proposes to pension was a soldier in an Indian uprising in the northeastern part of Oregon. The Bannocks, the Umatillas, and the Snakes, and renegades from other tribes rose suddenly and attacked the settlers in that section of the country, who at that time had grown to be quite numerous. The people were on the point of being exterminated. Capt. Oglesby, under State authority, organized a company of about 100 persons and proceeded to the point of greatest danger. There were 55 of the soldiers who accompanied him to this place, the remainder being left to guard other points. At this point where 55 were gathered over 600 hostile Indians surrounded them, and they made good there for a considerable time, and sent a courier across the State line into the then Washington Territory to Fort Walla Walla for regular troops, but before the regular troops got even started the Indians had attacked these men, and there was a very severe battle. A number of the Indians were killed and some of the soldiers were killed and a number wounded. Capt. Oglesby did good work and bore himself quite bravely, according to the reports. In the latter part of the attack he was shot in the knee by an Indian bullet, the bullet entering under the kneecap and embedding itself in the knee joint. The surgeon refused to cut it out, and he has the bullet in his knee at this time. That incapacitated him from further service in the war. He has never asked for a pension until recently, and is now, at the age of 76, unable to make a living, and dependent upon what the pension will give him, if granted. I have talked with him. He rendered a good service. If it had not been for his courage and bravery in leading those men at one time when they were greatly alarmed at the sight of so many Indians, hundreds of people would have lost their lives, great property would have been destroyed by fire, the wheat fields would have been set on fire, and a much larger Indian war would have developed out of this by reason of it. I hope the chairman of the committee will agree that this item remain in the bill.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I want to state to the gentleman, on page 35, under the amendments set out in the report, you will find the following:

This is the case of William W. Oglesby, who, it appears from the report accompanying the bill, claims to have served during the Bannock Indian War in 1878. There is no record in the War Department to show that he was ever mustered in the United States service, and Congress has never passed a general law providing pensions for such persons engaged in Indian hostilities subsequent to 1865 who were not regularly mustered into the United States service, and your committee can see no justification for the approval of this claim.

Now, I would like to say in addition that the Senate will undoubtedly ask for a conference on the various items in these bills, and this matter can be taken up in conference.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the gentleman will give me his assurance——

Mr. KEY of Ohio. No; I will not do that.

Mr. HAWLEY (continuing). That he will permit the item to remain in there——

Mr. KEY of Ohio. This man was never mustered into the Regular Army, and it will be a direct violation of the rules of our committee, and I can see no way where I can consent to it. Now, if the conferees will do that in conference, I am willing; but I should not consent to it now. I think the gentleman had better let it go to conference and the item will receive careful consideration; but I could not consent to it now.

Mr. HAWLEY. Prior to 1865, if I remember correctly, meritorious cases of this kind where public service was rendered by a man who did not have time to enlist himself in the Government service, but rendered the same kind of service, were recognized by pensions. This Capt. Oglesby did at his own private expense and loss of his property. His horses were killed in the war. He had no time to join the service, but rendered the service that others did who had a little more time and were not in such stress of need. Where because of the danger to the people he volunteered his services, it seems to me that the country can well afford to recognize such service as that, especially when the object of it all these years has supported himself, and now, when he is facing a lack of food and shelter in his old age, is lame with a bullet he received in his knee in that war, he comes here asking for a few dollars that Congress may take a little care of him. I think it ought to be granted.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Well, I think the gentleman had better let this go to conference. The Senate committee will ask for a conference, and I am sure if it is a meritorious claim the conferees will see that justice is done. The members of the House committee who consider these Senate bills have gone carefully into this matter, and I do not believe we ought to attempt to amend these bills on the floor of the House. It establishes a precedent. It simply puts the nose of the camel under the tent and there will be no end to amending bills on the floor of the House, and I suggest to the gentleman that he allow this matter to go to conference.

Mr. HAWLEY. If I had some assurance from the gentleman that the matter would be favorably considered——

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I can not promise the gentleman what I will do; I can not speak for the other conferees as to what they will do. The matter will have to be discussed and thrashed out, but I will assure the gentleman that we will carefully consider the case.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

UNSURVEYED, UNTAXED LAND GRANTS IN THE STATE OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed to address the House on the subject of unsurveyed, untaxed land grants in the State of Washington.

Mr. Speaker, several times in debate here I have taken the time of the House in discussing the subject of unsurveyed, untaxed land grants in several Western States, and particularly in the State of Washington. I have stated that there are over 700,000 acres of unsurveyed granted lands in Washington State of which title is nominally held by the Government, but which, as a matter of fact, is pledged to and owned by railroad and land-holding corporations.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, to set forth here the peculiar conditions at the present time which on close analysis substantiate the statement that the United States Government, through its own negligence or lack of action, has prevented municipalities, counties, and States between Lake Superior and the Pacific coast from collecting taxes on something like 16,000,000 acres of unsurveyed land granted directly and by lieu-land script to certain railroads.

It is true, sir, that either the Congress of the United States or the Interior Department, or both, have failed utterly to protect the public interest in this matter.

RAILROAD LAND-GRANT LEGISLATION.

I wish, briefly, to refer, Mr. Speaker, to certain legislation enacted during the last half century, involving public-land gifts and indemnities to the Northern Pacific Railway.

The act incorporating the Northern Pacific Railway Co. and providing for certain land grants was enacted July 2, 1864 (13 Stat., 315), just 50 years ago this month. This act granted to the Northern Pacific Railway Co. a right of way 200 feet wide through public lands from the west shores of Lake Superior by the most feasible route to Puget Sound.

The act further provided that the Government grant the Northern Pacific Railway 10 alternate sections of land, nonmineral, designated by odd numbers, on each side of said railroad line through the States, and 20 alternate sections of land, nonmineral, per mile on each side of the said line in Territories.

This act specifically provided that the land should be surveyed and the patents issue as the road building progressed; also provided that the road should be fully completed in July, 1876, just 12 years after the passage of the act.

Mark you, Mr. Speaker, this original act of July, 1864, organized the Northern Pacific Railway Co., granted a right of way 200 feet wide from the Lakes to the Pacific, also granted approximately 45,000,000 acres of land, and provided that the road should be completed and equipped and all lands surveyed by June 4, 1876.

The company was somewhat slow in organizing, and in May, 1866 (14 Stat., 355), the railroad was granted an extension of two years for beginning and completion.

Note, Mr. Speaker, the consideration herein given the railway company by the Congress.

The company finally organized, proceeded by aid of Congress to realize something "substantial" on the munificent land gift and franchise made by the Government, and in May, 1870 (16 Stat., 378), an act passed Congress authorizing the company to mortgage its franchise, lands, and road; and, further, created indemnity limits and specially provided that all lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railway Co. which should not be sold, or which on account of not having been disposed of remained subject to the mortgage authorized by the act, should be subject to settlement the same as other public lands at the price paid the railway company not to exceed $2.50 per acre.

Again, Mr. Speaker, note the above favorable consideration given the company.

The act of July 15, 1870 (16 Stat., 305), provided an appropriation of $96,000 for Northern Pacific land surveys, and specified that before the railway company could convey to a purchaser any of the lands granted under any of the acts relating to the railroad company the Government should be reimbursed all survey costs by the railway company or its assigns.

Advantage has been taken of this latter provision by the railroad company to forestall, and protect itself from, paying taxes on these lands.

RAILROADS TAKE LEGAL ADVANTAGES.

Technical points of law have been used to the advantage of the railroad, and I cite one case in point.

Northern Pacific Railway Co. v. Thrall County (United States report, 115–600). In this case an appeal was taken from the superior court of the Territory of Dakota, submitted November 17, 1885.

Briefly the facts are that the treasurer of Thrall County, following the provisions of the laws of Dakota Territory, assessed certain Northern Pacific lands, and on nonpayment by the railroad company proceeded to sell these certain lands, and published notice that on certain date in October, 1881, he would sell said lands according to law.

The railroad company brought suit to enjoin collection of taxes levied upon land of plaintiff in error. The United States Supreme Court reversed the decision of the superior court of the Territory of Dakota, and a decree was entered perpetually enjoining the treasurer of Thrall County from further proceeding to collect taxes; and, Mr. Chairman, the point at issue and on which the decision was made was that the railroad company had not as yet reimbursed the United States for the costs of the surveys. Thus, although the road was built, the lands surveyed, and adjoining lands being settled, the railroad lands did not go to patent and were not placed on the tax lists because of the fact above referred to, namely, railroad not ready or willing to reimburse the Government for survey costs.

Mr. Justice Miller, who delivered the opinion of the court, said:

> The United States made a magnificent grant to this company of lands equal in quantity to forty or fifty thousand square miles, an area as large as an average State of the Union. It thought proper to require of the grantee the payment of the costs of making the surveys necessary to the location and ascertainment of these lands. To secure the payment of those expenses it decided to retain the legal title in its own hands until they were paid. The Government was, as to these costs, in the condition of a trustee in a conveyance to secure payment of money. But if the land was liable to be sold for taxes due to State, Territorial, or county organizations this security would be easily lost.
> No sale of land for taxes, no taxes can be assessed on any property, but by virtue of the sovereign authority in whose jurisdiction it is done. If not assessed by direct act of the legislature itself, it must, to be valid, be done under authority of a law enacted by such legislature. A valid sale, therefore, for taxes, being the highest exercise of sovereign power of the State, must carry the title to the property sold, and if it does not do this it is because the assessment is void.
> It follows that if the assessment of these taxes is valid and the proceeding well conducted the sale confers a title paramount to all others, and thereby destroys the lien of the United States for the costs of surveying these lands. If, on the other hand, the sale would not confer such a title, it is because there exists no authority to make it.
> At all events, the holder of the equitable title to these lands has a right to prevent a sale which would have the effect of impeding the United States in the assertion of the right to them until these costs are paid.
> We are aware of the use being made of this principle by the companies who, having earned the lands, neglect to pay these costs in order to prevent taxation. The remedy lies with Congress and is of easy application. If that body will take steps to enforce its lien for these costs of survey by sale of the lands or by forfeiture of title, the Treasury of the United States would soon be reimbursed for its expenses in making the surveys and the States and Territories in which the lands lay be remitted to their appropriate rights of taxation. The courts can do no more than declare the law as it exists.

This decision, Mr. Speaker, was rendered nearly 30 years ago, and still vast areas of these granted lands are not paying taxes.

"Inertia of Government," the lack of legislative and executive action, Mr. Speaker, have caused the Public Treasury a loss of millions of dollars of tax money, extending over a period from 1876 to 1914—38 years.

It is estimated that about 16,000,000 acres of indemnity land grants are still unsurveyed, and of this some 6,000,000 or 7,000,000 acres of valuable land, productive when improved and which should now be on the tax rolls, are not taxed. If these lands were on the tax rolls bringing in a nominal tax of 10 cents per acre, even on the best grade of lands, $600,000 or $700,000 a year would find its way into the public money fund. I give these figures simply to fix a definite idea in the minds of gentlemen, the loss to the country, if we continue to sit idly here and let present conditions remain. In my State, sir, I venture to estimate that the annual loss to the public is approximately $200,000.

Mr. Speaker, I have referred to four legislative acts enacted by the Congress of the United States, all of which accrued to the benefit of the Northern Pacific Railway Co. I might recite several other acts involving first and second indemnity limits, lieu-land acts which also greatly benefit the Northern Pacific Railway Co., and while these latter have no bearing on the unsurveyed, untaxed feature, I refer to them to impress on the minds of gentlemen here the fact that, generally speaking, every legislative enactment in connection with this railroad land-grant matter has served the company's interests.

WHY DOES THE GOVERNMENT PAY HALF SURVEY COSTS?

The act of July 2, 1870, provided that the railroad company should pay for the survey of its lands, each odd section. It is evident that in surveying odd sections, even sections are incidentally surveyed.

This, without question, was understood in the consideration of the original land-grant act of July, 1864, and was definitely set forth in the act of July, 1870. But by some hocus-pocus turn the railroad company, with the aid of Congress and department officials, succeeded in saddling one-half the cost on the Government.

In any of the acts involving these land grants there is no provision that the Government should pay one-half the cost of the survey.

The practice, like Topsy, just grew, and the railroads reaped the benefit. It is true that the department officials have made rulings and decisions assuming to hold that the Government must pay one-half the cost, but I challenge a substantial authority or citation of law upholding this position.

On March 2, 1895 (28 Stat., p. 937), Congress passed an act making a continuing appropriation of $100,000 for the purpose of cooperating with the railroad company for the survey of these lands.

But there was no definite provision in said act providing that the railroad company should advance a like amount or expend dollar for dollar with the Government; hence another long delay.

On June 25, 1910, Congress enacted a law providing for the collection by the Government in advance of amounts necessary to pay the railroad's part of the expense.

This law makes ample provision for collection in advance of the amounts which the railroads pay for surveying lands within the granted limits. The present status of the matter indicates that the railroads are ready for survey and issue of patent on these land grants and, at the direction of the Government, have made a deposit of $100,000 in the Treasury on call of the Secretary to pay for surveying costs.

GOVERNMENT ALONE RESPONSIBLE FOR FURTHER DELAY.

We have reason to assume that no further delay will be made by the railroad company, and any delay from this time on will be charged to the Government's negligence.

The act of March 2, 1895 (28 Stat., p. 937), made what is known as continuing appropriations for the survey of railroad land grants. This, together with the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat., p. 304), makes effective legislation, to a certain degree, within the primary limits or grants.

This continuing appropriation provides for the appropriation of $100,000, but there has been a portion of this money applied for administrative features in the department, which cuts the appropriation down to $75,000 for the current year ending June, 1915, so that we now have an appropriation on the part of the Government of $70,000 or $75,000.

THE FALCONER SURVEY BILL, H. R. 17970.

It occurs to me, sir, that the Government should put up as much money as can be used, for there is no denying the proposition that the taxes on a township of land for one year ought to pay for the cost, even though the Government had to pay all the cost of survey. Hence it makes a vital difference to the average taxpayer whether these lands are surveyed in the next 3 years or the next 10 years, and to the end that the survey may progress more rapidly I have introduced a bill, H. R. 17970, which provides that there shall be appropriated sufficient money to immediately proceed to the survey of all land grants in the State of Washington. There are areas of valuable lands within these limits not now bearing their portion of the taxes, and these should be entered on the tax lists within the next two or three years.

It is hard to explain to the people of my State why these surveys have not been made before. The man who owns farm or timber land on which he is paying taxes, ranging from 10 cents to $1 per acre, does not willingly submit to a condition in which the railroad company or its assigns owning valuable land adjoining his holding pay no taxes.

All lieu selections and indemnity-land grants should be surveyed whether within the original limits or not. In many portions of my State there are St. P., M. & M. and other scrip holdings covering some of the very richest timberland in the State, some sections that are probably worth $50,000 and more, on which no taxes are being paid.

I personally know and have been through a number of tracts of this kind in the north fork of Skykomish in Snohomish County, and this is characteristic of upriver lands in many portions in western Washington.

The purpose of my bill is to cover these lands and place them on the tax rolls of the several counties in my State.

The county commissioners of the several counties in the southwest and in the northwest parts of Washington State are thoroughly alive to the necessity for and are emphatically demanding that these surveys be made.

I have called the attention of the Interior Department and of the Public Lands Committee of the House of Representatives to the situation in the State of Washington. I have sent to the department and the committee maps showing large areas of untaxed lands in King County.

The West is rapidly developing, and progress and development bring demands for money from the Public Treasury. Our only means of getting money is through taxation, and it is a mighty poor government that would knowingly permit large and influential interests to escape their portion of taxes. The whole burden of nontaxed lands is, as above suggested, now resting upon the shoulders of this Congress.

Commissioner Tollman has very urgently requested the Finance Committee of the House to make a sufficient appropriation.

The Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Franklin K. Lane, urges the survey of all granted lands, and the officials of the State of Washington are demanding the survey.

As many efficient corps of surveyors as could be gotten into the field during the splendid summer season in Washington State should be employed and this work expedited and hurried along to the end that this one disturbing factor of "untaxed lands" could be eliminated from economic discussions in our State. I earnestly solicit early consideration of H. R. 17970.

"That all commerce between two or more States, or between a State and a Territory or a District of the United States, and all commerce within a Territory or District of the United States, and all commerce between any part of the United States and any part of a foreign country, is hereby designated and referred to in this act as interstate commerce.

"SEC. 2. That all corporations with a capital of $1,000,000 or more engaged in interstate commerce, and now existing or hereafter created, except corporations subject to the jurisdiction and regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, shall hereafter be subject to the inspection, supervision, and regulation of the Secretary of the Department of Commerce in the manner and to the extent specified in this act, and shall be required to apply for and to obtain the license hereinafter prescribed.

"SEC. 3. That all existing corporations subject to the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Department of Commerce, as provided in the preceding section, shall, within three months after this act takes effect, make written application to the Secretary of said department for a license to engage in interstate commerce. Such application shall be accompanied with a duly authenticated copy of the charter or articles of incorporation and the by-laws of the corporation, and shall state, among other things, the date when the corporation was formed, when it began business and its principal place of business, the nature and character of the business engaged in, a description of its tangible and physical property, where the same is located and its value as near as may be, the amount, denomination, and number of bonds authorized, issued, and outstanding, and the date and maturity of such bonds and the rate of interest they bear and when the same is payable, for what purpose the bonds were issued and for what purpose the proceeds have been used, and on what property such bonds are secured, and the nature and form of such security, with an authenticated copy of the instrument of mortgage or deed of trust, the amount, nature, and character of all other indebtedness, the amount of each and every kind of capital stock authorized, issued, and outstanding, the voting power of the stock, the par value of the shares of stock, the rate of dividend required and paid on the same, whether such dividend is cumulative, whether the stock is fully paid and nonassessable, and whether the stockholders are personally liable and if liable to what extent, and how and for what purpose the proceeds of the stock have been used by the corporation, and what salaries are paid the principal officers. The said application shall also embrace the income account of the corporation for the last fiscal year and its last balance sheet, and shall be subscribed and verified by the oath of the president, secretary, and treasurer of the corporation; and in case such oath is willfully false or untrue, the person making the same shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and on conviction thereof in a court of competent jurisdiction shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. The Secretary of Commerce, on receiving an application conformable to the foregoing provisions, if he is satisfied that the corporation is solvent and is engaged in interstate commerce, shall, upon the payment of a fee of $50, issue, under his hand and the seal of the department and deliver to the corporation making the application, a license authorizing the corporation to engage and to continue to engage in interstate commerce, which license shall continue in force until canceled or revoked as hereinafter provided; and no corporation engaged in interstate commerce with a capital of $1,000,000 or more, except such as are subject to the jurisdiction and regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, shall be permitted to engage in such interstate commerce without making the application and procuring the license hereinbefore prescribed, and this prohibition may be enforced by writ of injunction in the district courts of the United States.

"SEC. 4. That all corporations with a capital of $1,000,000 or more created subsequent to the passage and approval of this act that intend to engage in interstate commerce and are not subject to the jurisdiction and regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall, before engaging in interstate commerce, make written application to the Secretary of the Department of Commerce for a license to engage in such commerce. Such application shall be accompanied with a duly authenticated copy of the charter or articles of incorporation and the by-laws of the corporation, and shall state and specify, among other things, the date when the corporation has been formed, when it intends to engage in the business of interstate commerce, the nature and character of such business, where it intends to carry on the same and its principal place of business, a description of its tangible and physical property, where the same is located and its value as near as may be, the amount of bonds it is authorized to issue, has issued, and proposes to issue, the denomination of such bonds, their date, maturity, and rate of interest, and at what rate of discount, in the form of a commission or otherwise, the same have been or will be sold and the net amount which will enure to the corporation from the sale of the same, the purpose for which the proceeds of such bonds have been or will be used, the property upon which said bonds are, or will be, secured, and the nature and form of the security, the amount of each and every kind of capital stock authorized to be issued, that has been issued and is proposed to be issued, the number of shares of each kind of stock and their par value, the voting power of the stock, whether the stock when issued has been paid for, or will be paid for, in full, in cash or in property or both, and if paid for in property the nature, location, and value of such property, and if not paid for in full then the proportion remaining unpaid and whether the same is subject to call, and whether the stockholders are personally liable and if liable to what extent, what preference, if any, as to dividends one kind of stock has over other kinds of stock, whether any kind of stock has in any form or to any extent been given as an inducement or bonus to subscribers for bonds or preferred stock, for what purpose the proceeds of the stock has been or will be used, and what salaries are paid or are to be paid to the principal officers of the corporation. Said application shall be subscribed and verified by the oath of the president, secretary, and treasurer of the corporation; and in case such oath is wilfully false or untrue, the person making the same shall be deemed guilty of perjury and on conviction thereof in a court of competent jurisdiction shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court. The Secretary of Commerce on receiving an application conformable to the provisions of this section, if he is satisfied that the corporation has or is likely to have the means to carry on the business of interstate commerce which it intends to carry on, shall, upon the payment of $50, issue under his hand and the seal of the department and deliver to the corporation making the application a license authorizing the corporation to engage in the business of interstate commerce, which license shall continue in force until canceled or revoked as hereinafter provided, and no such corporation shall be permitted to engage in the business of interstate commerce without making the application and procuring the license hereinbefore prescribed, and this prohibition may be enforced by writ of injunction in the district courts of the United States.

"SEC. 5. That the board of directors of corporations applying for and obtaining license to engage in interstate commerce as provided in sections 3 and 4 of this act, shall keep, or cause to be kept, in a suitable book, to be called the directors' book, a full, true, and correct record of all acts and transactions of the board pertaining to the business and property of the corporation occurring and taking place at their meeting or elsewhere, and a record of the vote on every resolution, motion, or proposition presented to or acted upon by the board, and the names of the directors voting in the affirmative on any proposition and the names of those voting in the negative on the same.

"The directors' book shall, during all reasonable business hours, be open to the inspection of all bondholders and stockholders of the corporation; and a duly authenticated copy of the same shall be filed in the Department of Commerce. If the directors fail to keep, or cause to be kept, such a record in such a book, as aforesaid, or having kept the same, destroy, deface, or obliterate it, or any part thereof, or by their negligence suffer the same to be done, they shall each of them be deemed guilty of a crime, and on conviction thereof in a court of competent jurisdiction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court, and they shall also be jointly and severally liable in a civil action for all damages which any person may sustain in consequence of such crime.

"SEC. 6. That the presiding officer and secretary of every stockholders' meeting of corporations applying for and obtaining license to engage in interstate commerce, as provided in sections 3 and 4 of this act, shall keep, or cause to be kept, in a suitable book, termed 'Stockholders' book,' a full, true, and correct record of all business transacted at such meetings and of the vote on every proposition, giving the number of shares and by whom voted in the affirmative and in the negative on every proposition voted upon. Such book shall, during all reasonable business hours, be open to the inspection of the officers, bondholders, and stockholders of the corporation, and a duly authenticated copy of the same shall be filed in the Department of Commerce.

"In case the president and secretary of such meeting fail to keep, or cause to be kept, such a record in such a book, as aforesaid, or, having kept the same, destroy, deface, or obliterate it, or any part thereof, or by their negligence suffer the same to be done, they shall each of them be deemed guilty of a crime, and on conviction thereof in a court of competent jurisdiction shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court, and they shall also be jointly and severally liable in a civil action for all damages which any person may sustain in consequence of such crime.

"SEC. 7. That no corporation licensed under and pursuant to the provisions of sections 3 and 4 of this act shall, after obtaining such license, be permitted to issue or dispose of any capital stock, bonds, or other obligations or securities, in addition to such as may have been issued and are outstanding at the time the license was granted, without first securing the permission and authority of the Secretary of Commerce to issue and dispose of such additional stock, bonds, or other securities and obligations. Any corporation desiring to secure such permission and authority shall, before securing the same, make written application therefor to the Secretary of Commerce, and in such application shall specify and describe the character, location, and value of all its physical and tangible property, the character, nature, and volume of its business and where conducted, the amount of all kinds of capital stock issued and outstanding, giving the number of shares of each kind of stock, the dividend paid on each kind of stock and when payable, the amount, number, date, and maturity of all bonds or other securities or obligations issued and outstanding, and the rate of interest on the same and when and where payable, the amount, character, and value of all credits due and belonging to the corporation, the amount of cash working capital, if any, on hand, the amount, character, and description of the additional stocks, bonds, or other securities and obligations sought to be issued and disposed of and to whom and upon what terms and conditions to be issued and disposed of; and for what purposes and to what use the proceeds of such additional stocks, bonds, and other securities are to be devoted and the necessity for the issue and disposal of such additional stocks and bonds. The said application shall also include the income account of the corporation for its last fiscal year and its last balance sheet, and shall be subscribed and verified by the oath of the president, the secretary, and treasurer of the corporation; and in case such oath is false or untrue, the person making the same shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and on conviction thereof in a court of competent jurisdiction shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. On receiving such written application as aforesaid the Secretary of Commerce shall proceed to investigate the subject matter of the same and hold a hearing thereon, and may summon and hear witnesses and require the production of books, reports, and other documents relating to the subject matter of the application. If after full hearing and due consideration the Secretary of Commerce is satisfied that permission and authority should be given to the corporation making the application to issue additional stock, bonds, or other securities and obligations, he shall make and issue an order permitting and authorizing the corporation to issue and dispose of such an additional amount of stock, bonds, or other securities and obligations as he may deem advisable and shall specify in the order. Any and every officer of such corporation who joins or in any manner participates in the issue, or attempt to issue, of such additional stock, bonds, or other securities and obligations, without the permission and authority of the Secretary of Commerce, shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and on conviction thereof in a court of competent jurisdiction shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court; and such officers as well as the corporation may be restrained by writ of injunction from committing such offense.

"SEC. 8. That no corporation licensed under and pursuant to the provisions of sections 3 and 4 of this act shall, after being so licensed, be permitted to own or hold stock, bonds, or other securities of any other corporation, and in case it is the owner or holder of such stocks, bonds, or other securities it shall within one year after the passage of this act entirely and completely divest itself of the same, and in case of failure to comply with these requirements, the same may be enforced by judicial proceedings in any court of competent jurisdiction. No officer or director of any corporation licensed as aforesaid shall be an officer or director in any other corporation engaged in the same or similar kind of interstate commerce as the corporation of which they or either of them are first appointed officers and directors, and a violation of this provision shall be deemed a misdemeanor, for which the guilty party shall, upon conviction in a court of competent jurisdiction, be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

"SEC. 9. That all corporations licensed under and pursuant to the provisions of section 3 and 4 of this act shall annually, at the end of each fiscal or business year, make and deliver to the Secretary of Commerce a full and true report of their business, of their financial condition, and of their income and outlay account for the year, in such form and with such details as the Secretary may prescribe, which report shall, before delivery to the Secretary, be verified by the oath of the president, the secretary, and the treasurer of the corporation, and in case such oath is false or untrue the person making the same shall be deemed guilty of perjury and on conviction thereof in a court of competent jurisdiction shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court; and said officers may also be compelled by writ of mandamus to make the report as and in the manner above prescribed. The Secretary of Commerce may, from time to time, require further and additional reports from such corporations in relation to their business and financial condition, which reports, when called for, shall be furnished and shall be verified in the like manner as the reports hereinbefore prescribed, and the affiants shall be subject to the same penalties for false oaths as in the case of the reports last mentioned. The Secretary of Commerce and the employees of his department designated by him therefor shall, during all business hours and during other reasonable hours, have full and complete access to inspect all the books, records, reports, memoranda, and minutes of such corporations relating to their business and financial condition, and in case such access is refused the Secretary may secure the same by writ of mandamus from any court of competent jurisdiction, but no trade secrets obtained through such access and inspection shall be made public except by the express written direction of the Secretary. The Secretary of Commerce, for the purpose of securing further additional information in regard to the business and financial condition of such corporations, may summon and subpœna as witnesses the officers and employees of the corporation and other persons and take their testimony under oath, and in case such witnesses refuse to attend and to testify they may be compelled to attend and to testify by any court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, That no person shall be prosecuted or be subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, in any proceeding, suit, or prosecution: Provided further, That no person so testifying shall be exempt from prosecution or punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

"SEC. 10. That in case the Secretary of Commerce ascertains or discovers that any corporation required to apply for and obtain a license as prescribed in sections 3 and 4 of this act violates any of the provisions of this act, or the provisions of any other law of the United States, he shall report such violation and all the facts and evidence in his possession in connection therewith to the Attorney General of the United States, who shall, if it appears to him from the data and evidence thus reported to him, or from any evidence or data in the possession of his department, that the corporation has violated the provisions of this act or of any other law of the United States, proceed by appropriate judicial proceedings to enforce the provisions of law that have thus been violated, and for that purpose on behalf of the United States he may exercise the necessary visitatorial power. Any corporation that is required to apply for and to obtain a license as prescribed in sections 3 and 4 of this act which refuses to apply for and take out such license shall be enjoined from engaging in the business of interstate commerce; and proceedings to procure such injunction shall be instituted in the district court of the United States for the district in which the corporation has its principal place of business, which court is hereby given jurisdiction of such proceedings.

"SEC. 11. That the Secretary of Commerce shall, within one week after the first Monday of December in each year, make a report to Congress specifying the names and the principal place of business of all corporations licensed under the provisions of this act, the amount of capital stock, common and preferred, and the amount of bonds and other securities or obligations issued and outstanding of each corporation, the dividend paid on each kind of stock and when payable, the rate of interest paid on bonds and other securities and when paid and when such bonds and securities are due and payable, the general character of the interstate commerce carried on and the entire income and outlay for the last business or fiscal year of the corporation, and such other facts as will give information in regard to the operations of corporations licensed under the provisions of this act."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to what I believe ought to be a correction in the RECORD. On page 12656 the RECORD shows that—

> A bill was introduced, read the first time by its title, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:
> By Mr. LEWIS:
> A bill (S. 6160) providing for the extension of the post office at Galesburg, Ill.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

That is not a pension bill nor a private claims bill. It may have been introduced when I was absent from the Chamber, but I understood that other Senators would have objected to the introduction of such bills. I certainly would have objected if I had been here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is correct. The clerks are in no wise to blame. The Chair on yesterday morning refused to receive petitions or anything else on objection. Upon examining Rule VII the Chair was convinced that certain bills, petitions, and memorials could be left with the Secretary of the Senate, indorsing upon them the names of the Senators introducing them and the reference or disposition to be made thereof.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection whatever as to a petition, but paragraph 2 of Rule VII provides that—

> Senators having petitions, memorials, pension bills, bills for the payment of private claims or for the correction of naval or military records to present after the morning hour may deliver them to the Secretary of the Senate, indorsing upon them their names and the reference or disposition to be made thereof, and said petitions, memorials, and bills shall, with the approval of the presiding officer, be entered on the Journal with the names of the Senators presenting them as having been read twice and referred to the appropriate committees—

And so forth. If this——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah is probably correct, and if there is objection to the introduction of the bill by the Senator from Illinois——

Mr. SMOOT. There is. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the bill will be withdrawn from the RECORD and returned to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer a proposed amendment to the bill under consideration and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Can the amendment offered be read?

The SECRETARY. The amendment proposed by Mr. CUMMINS is to insert, as a new section, the following:

SEC. —. It shall be unlawful for any corporation engaged in commerce to acquire, own, hold, or control, either directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the capital stock, or other share capital, or any other means of control or participation in the control, of any other corporation also engaged in commerce if the business of such corporations is naturally and by reason of character and location competitive.

Whenever the commission shall have reason to believe that any corporation so engaged in commerce has acquired or is owning, holding, or controlling, either directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the capital stock, or other share capital, or any other means of control or participation in the control of any other corporation also engaged in commerce, and that the business of the two or more corporations is naturally and by reason of character and location competitive, it shall issue and serve upon such corporation a written order at least 30 days in advance of the time stated therein for hearing, directing it to appear before the commission and show why an order should not be issued by the commission requiring it to cease and desist from such unlawful acquisition, holding, or controlling, and commanding it to bring itself into conformity with the law; and if upon such hearing the commission shall find that such corporation has acquired, or is holding, owning, or controlling the capital stock, or other share capital, or other means of control, or participation in the control, of any other corporation contrary to the provisions of this section, it shall thereupon issue an order in such terms as the circumstances may warrant requiring that the said corporation shall bring itself into conformity with the law by ceasing to acquire, own, hold, or control the whole or any part of the capital stock, or other share capital, or any other means of control or participation in the control, of such other corporation or corporations.

The commission may at any time modify or set aside in whole or in part any order issued by it under this section.

If, after the issuance of such an order, the commission shall find that such corporation has not complied therewith, it may file a petition in the district court of the United States in any district wherein such corporation is located or carrying on business, praying the court to issue an injunction to enforce its order, and the court is hereby authorized to issue such injunction and to enforce obedience according to the law and the rules applicable in suits in equity: Provided, That this section shall not apply to banks, banking institutions, or common carriers: Provided further, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall have any force or effect, nor be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

Any suit brought to annul, set aside, or cancel, in whole or in part, any such order of the commission shall be brought against the commission in the district court of the United States in the district wherein the corporation has its principal office or place of business, and the procedure shall be according to the provisions of the law relating to suits brought to set aside or suspend orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I want to understand for future guidance the ruling of the Chair. Does the Chair rule that petitions are admissible upon the convening of the Senate, now that we are taking recesses, unless there is objection to them?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled, after attention was called to the following rule:

Senators having petitions, memorials, pension bills, bills for the payment of private claims or for the correction of naval or military records to present after the morning hour may deliver them to the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am familiar with the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Now, all that the Chair has ruled is that when they come within the terms of that rule and are presented to the Secretary of the Senate the Chair has instructed the Secretary to properly note them in the RECORD.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But the Chair has not ruled that there is any morning hour when we recess, of course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, no.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. So that as long as we recess no objection is necessary to the presentation of petitions in order to exclude them from being received.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no morning hour.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Therefore petitions can not be received at all when the Senate recesses from one day to another.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not to be entered in the Journal or the RECORD until the Senate resumes a morning hour, as I understand it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, no. The rule does not say so.

And said petitions, memorials, and bills shall, with the approval of the presiding officer, be entered on the Journal with the names of the Senators presenting them as having been read twice and referred to the appropriate committees, and the Secretary of the Senate shall furnish a transcript of such entries to the Official Reporter of Debates for publication in the RECORD.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But I desire to direct the attention of the Chair to the fact that Rule VII applies to what may be done when there is a morning hour and morning business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We have had a morning hour.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Can there be a morning hour when the Senate is in recess from day to day on the same legislative day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present legislative day, although continuing, has had its morning hour, and the rule reads, "after the morning hour."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. How can there be morning business if there is not any morning hour?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a morning hour.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is this the morning hour?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the morning hour has expired.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When did it expire?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It expired on the calendar day of Thursday, but on the legislative day of to-day.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then, if that is so, if there is a morning hour of the legislative day under which we are now operating, why can not morning business proceed right along every calendar day that we meet?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not ruled that way.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is morning business in order each calendar day, or is it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It certainly is not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I fail to see how morning business can be received.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair wishes he could make it plainer. The rule itself seems sufficiently plain.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Chair, for information, when we take a recess and thereby continue the legislative day into the next calendar day, would petitions, would bills, would anything that is to be done during the morning hour be in order, except by unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not want to read more than three times this morning clause 2 of Rule VII.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Chair will pardon me. I wish to say that the Chair spoke so low I could not hear the statement of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Paragraph 2 of Rule VII settles the question beyond any doubt.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I have asked the Senator to yield to me for the purpose of offering an amendment in the nature of a substitute for section 5 of the pending bill. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate and that it be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let it be read, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The amendment was ordered to be printed and to lie on the table, and was read, as follows:

SEC. 5. That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful. The commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent corporations from using unfair methods of competition in commerce.

Whenever the commission shall have reason to believe, either from information in its possession or upon the complaint of another, that any corporation has been or is using any unfair methods of competition in commerce, it shall cause to be prepared and placed on file with the secretary of said commission a complaint against said corporation setting forth concisely the facts constituting the alleged unfair methods of competition so used by said corporation, which complaint shall be entered of record, and it shall serve upon said corporation an order setting forth a copy of said complaint at least 30 days in advance of the time set therein for hearing, directing it to appear before the commission and show cause why an order shall not be issued by the commission requiring it to cease and desist from such unfair methods of competition. The testimony in any such proceeding shall be taken under such rules as the commission may prepare and shall be reduced to writing and filed in the office of the commission. The commission shall enter of record its findings of fact and conclusions of law relating to said complaint and shall issue an order in accordance therewith, and said order shall be final except as hereinafter provided.

Until a transcript of the record of such hearing shall have been filed in a district court of the United States as hereinafter provided, the commission may at any time upon its own motion or upon the motion of any one aggrieved by said order, upon such notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper, modify, or set aside in whole or in part any report or any order made or issued by it under this section.

Such corporation at any time within 30 days after the commission shall have made any order upon a hearing requiring such corporation to cease and desist from using the said unfair methods of competition, or within 30 days after the notice of any modification thereof, shall have the right to file its bill in equity in the district court of the United States within any district where the said corporation has its domicile or chief or branch office, or where any of the acts complained of were committed, together with a certified transcript of the entire record in the proceedings including all of the testimony taken in the proceedings and the report and order of the commission, to enjoin, set aside, and annul or suspend any order of said commission.

Upon the filing of said bill in equity and transcript of the record as aforesaid, the court shall have jurisdiction of the proceeding and of the issues determined therein, and notice of the filing of said bill in equity shall be served upon the commission. Said cause shall be tried upon the pleadings and the transcript thus filed unless the court shall be satisfied upon the application of either the corporation or the commission that there is other material and competent evidence necessary to a just determination of the complaint, which was not known to the party offering the same before or during the hearing by the commission, or which could not with reasonable diligence be produced at such hearing, in which event the court shall order it to be taken upon such terms and conditions as the court may deem best by the commission, or by a master, to be appointed by the court, and filed with the court to be considered by it in connection with the pleadings and transcript in said cause.

If such corporation fails or neglects to obey any original or modified order of the commission while the same is in effect, the commission may file its bill in equity in the district court of the United States in any district as hereinbefore designated together with a certified transcript of the record as aforesaid, and cause notice thereof to be served upon such corporation, and additional testimony may be taken upon the same terms and conditions and for the same purposes provided for in case the action is begun in the district court by the corporation as hereinbefore set forth.

In the proceedings begun as aforesaid the district court shall have jurisdiction thereof and shall have power to make and enter such orders and decrees as may be just and equitable.

The pendency of such suit shall not of itself stay or suspend the operation of the order of the commission, but the district court in its discretion may restrain or suspend in whole or in part the operation of the commission's order pending the final hearing and determination of the court. No order or injunction so restraining or suspending an order of the commission shall be made by the district court otherwise than upon notice and after hearing, except that in cases where irreparable damage would otherwise ensue to the petitioner, said court may on hearing after not less than three days' notice to the commission allow a temporary stay or suspension in whole or in part of the operation of the order of the commission for not more than 60 days from the date of the order of such court pending application to the court for its order or injunction, in which case the said order shall contain a specific finding that such irreparable damage would result to the petitioner. The court may upon like application and finding continue the temporary stay or suspension in whole or in part to such further period as it may deem proper.

The commission may provide for the publication of its reports under this section in such form and manner as may be best fitted for public information and use, and such authorized publication will be competent evidence of the reports of the commission therein contained in all courts of the United States and the several States.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, when the Senate recessed yesterday, or during the latter part of the discussion in which I engaged, I was referring to some phases of the Sherman antitrust law, and was about to refer to some matters which were brought out in the discussion following my remarks.

There is so much confusion in the relative powers of the Sherman Act and the act of 1887 that it would seem to furnish an additional reason why the whole question of Government supervision should be thoroughly studied, and I believe a result of that study would mean the repeal of that part of the Sherman Act of 1890 which seems to apply to public-service corporations. As the act now stands it places in the hands of the Attorney General a power much greater than should be given to any department or departmental officer. He may, practically speaking, compel a readjustment of the ownership of railroad properties under threat of criminal prosecution, and we literally see the managers of railway properties standing in waiting at the office of the Attorney General asking what they may do to enable them to carry on their business in a legal way.

The New Haven Railroad matter which is now pending is an illustration of that condition. One may not have any sympathy for the condition which exists in New England or he may be most solicitous for its outcome without being sufficiently prejudiced so that he will not recognize the almost absurdity of a Government official having the power to bring a suit compelling the readjustment or the segregation of great property interests. That question should be carefully determined by some other body, preferably and probably the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the law should be so framed that, if the public interest will be served, then consolidations might be made, and those made stand. There is a great difference of opinion as to whether the New Haven and the Boston & Maine are in any respect competitive. Practically speaking, one is an extension of the other; and I may express a layman's view that the Government suit will not prevail if one is brought to effect a separation; but if the Attorney General has power to bring suit or to compel the segregation of these two systems, he has an equal power to subdivide the New Haven and Boston & Maine Railroads into their constituents which go to make up those two systems. That means probably as many as 45 railroads as originally organized. Can anyone knowing the New England situation believe that this segregation would be for the public interest, and is it not conclusive that it would mean poorer service at a greater expense to the users of every public-service corporation? Indeed, the dismemberment of any of our great railway systems into their constituent parts and a restoration of the competitive conditions which existed 50, 40, 30, or even 20 years ago would, in my judgment, be an absurdity. But as the law now stands, if the Attorney General has any power in any case, he should make the law effective in every case, and, as I have demonstrated in another place, this would include a vast railway mileage and great numbers of corporations.

Could there be any more effective reason given for a Government of laws rather than a Government dependent upon individual initiative than the course which has been taken in relation of a Government suit compelling a dissolution of the Boston & Maine and New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroads? Suit was brought, as will be recalled, by the Roosevelt administration. Action upon it was suspended by the direction of the President before March 4, 1909, and soon after the advent of the succeeding administration the suit was dismissed upon the ground that the legislation passed by the State of Massachusetts had validated the consolidation. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] will remember that he referred to this matter yesterday in the discussion. Whatever may have been the facts then or now is unimportant. The important feature is that this administration has now ordered a suit, after maturely considering the question at a Cabinet meeting and otherwise. In other words, the action has apparently not been at any time considered from the standpoint of what the law is, but whether, in the opinion of those administering the law, suit should be brought. This might be a good policy to follow if we had an all-wise ruler, but it can not fail to be a policy which will bring about serious abuses and great scandals if it is to be extended or even continued.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very much interested in what the Senator from Massachusetts is saying about the bringing of actions by the Government to dissolve alleged railroad companies which have entered into combinations contrary to law, and I want to call his attention to what to me seems to be quite a difference in the cases, some of which he has cited. I think I can do that, probably, better by using as an illustration the combination of the New York Central, Lake Shore, the Nickel Plate, the Michigan Central, and some navigation companies on the Lakes. I can see that it would be quite a different thing for the New York Central Road to take over the Lake Shore Road, for instance, the New York Central running to Buffalo and the Lake Shore commencing at Buffalo and continuing on west and thus making one continuous line, from what it would be if, after it had acquired the Lake Shore or prior to that time, the Lake Shore had taken over another line running parallel with it, such as the Nickel Plate, for instance. I introduced a resolution some time ago to see whether the Attorney General could not be induced to commence an action to separate those lines, but, as the Senator from Massachusetts knows, that resolution was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and is slumbering there now in the sepulcher pigeonholes of that committee and probably always will.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that there is a big difference between a combination between two railroads running parallel and one railroad taking over another that is merely an extension of the first one.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. NORRIS. In the case of the Boston & Maine, I presume the issue will be whether or not that line and the New Haven line were previously competitors and in a great degree parallel lines running between the same terminals.

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator from Nevada wants to interject a comment before I answer the question of the Senator from Nebraska, I will yield to him.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I do wish to state, with reference to the statement of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], that the resolution which he offered regarding the New York Central was slumbering in the Interstate Commerce Committee; that it is true that the resolution which the Senator presented to this body, calling upon the Attorney General for his opinion, if my memory is correct, as to whether the holding by the New York Central of these parallel lines constituted a breach of the Sherman antitrust law, is still pending in the Committee on Interstate Commerce; but I wish to say with reference to it that when that matter came to the Interstate Commerce Committee it found the energies of that committee entirely absorbed in the consideration of the legislation now pending. Notwithstanding that, however, I took up the consideration of the Senator's resolution, looked up the authorities with reference to the right of Congress to call upon the Attorney General, who is the legal adviser of the executive department, for a legal opinion, and made some progress in that direction, finding that the Attorneys General had uniformly, so far as my study of the question extended, denied the right of Congress to make such inquiries.

I was then about to take up the study of the debates on the subject to ascertain what the view of Congress thereon had been, with a view of presenting the whole matter to the committee and finally presenting to the Senate a complete report upon the entire subject. Whilst I was engaged in that consideration I asked the Senator from Nebraska as to whether the matter was pressing, and I understood from him that he was not so urgent about it, as the State of Ohio, I think, or the State of Indiana, had commenced an investigation or inquiry regarding this matter. In view of the statement of the Senator from Nebraska and because of the very pressing business before the Interstate Commerce Committee, which absolutely absorbed its time, I thought that that matter could rest for a later day.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me further?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am aware of the fact that the Interstate Commerce Committee has been extremely busy and they have been working hard; I have no doubt of that; in fact, I have an idea that one of the reasons why the resolution introduced by me was referred to that committee was that it was so busy that it could not take it up. The resolution was almost what might be termed a formal proposition, and I have an idea that if the committee had devoted time to it it would not have taken more than five minutes to dispose of the matter one way or the other; but it seems that the chairman of the committee has been able to find a great deal of literature on the subject, and I have no doubt that he will find that Attorneys General have refused to answer that kind of resolutions in the past, perhaps. It would be well, however, it seems to me, if the Senate can not get the information in that way, to let the Attorney General refuse to give the information, and then perhaps another method can be devised by which this information can be obtained.

I am not criticizing the committee, because I know, and I think the Senate knows, that the committee has had a great deal of work on its hands, and one of the reasons why I did not want this really formal resolution referred to that committee—I think it was generally understood it meant its death when it went there—was because the committee would not have time to consider it, if they were inclined to give it any consideration.

The Senator did speak to me about the resolution, and I spoke with him several times about it. I made inquiries on various occasions; but he is mistaken when he gets the idea that because there were some investigations being conducted in Indiana—Ohio was the State I mentioned to the Senator—I was not anxious to see the resolution reported. I intended to explain to him that one of the reasons why I was in a hurry about it was in order that the matter might be determined, if possible, by the Federal Government before the State of Ohio passed on a great many applications that were being made by some of these roads and other subsidiary roads connected with them for permission to consolidate, which might afterwards make it somewhat difficult to dissolve them, and it seemed to me that that was one reason why action ought to be taken by the Federal Government. There may have been an entirely good reason why the Federal Government should not act. It seemed to me, however, that it was very plain.

The Senate will remember that when we discussed the resolution Senators thought it was not fair to the Attorney General that such a resolution should be introduced. There were some "whereases" in it, and it was thought by some that perhaps some of these "whereases" were not true. I remember that one of the "whereases" was that the Nickel Plate road and the Lake Shore road were parallel. Now, it might be well, if you are getting technical, to modify a "whereas" of that kind, and say that at last reports they were parallel. I had an idea that they were still parallel. I lived there when one of them was built right by the side of the other, and I supposed it was there yet. Those are some of the technical objections that were made to the resolution; and it was thought that it was best, in order to frame it up right, to send it to a committee that had so much to do that it could not possibly attend to what it already had in mind.

I remember that the Senator from Massachusetts, in the debate, thought that the Sherman antitrust law did not apply to the Nickel Plate and the Lake Shore because that was a consolidation that was made before the law was passed, a great many years ago. It was not as harmful then as it has become since, or would become since when other combinations that did not exist then extended the power of that great controlling corporation all the way to New York City. I thought it made no difference, and expressed myself at the time that it made no difference, whether this combination was organized before or after the law; that the law made it illegal, and that an action could be maintained in one case as well as the other.

There might be a chance for dispute there. I thought the proper place to submit it was to the Attorney General. The Senator will remember also that when this resolution in regard to the New Haven was pending some Senators thought——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, to whom does the Senator allude when he says "the Senator"? Does he refer to me or to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. NORRIS. As expressing an opinion about the legality of that combination?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I am alluding to the Senator from Massachusetts when I say that. He expressed that opinion at the time we had the resolution up for consideration. I thought he was wrong. I based the resolution on the theory that he was wrong. I thought the proper place to submit something of that kind that was disputed was to the Attorney General, and to let him decide. If that is a good defense, then there is no use beginning the action; and it seemed to me it was the proper place to send it.

When we had the New Haven resolution before us there were Senators, as I remember now, who objected to it and thought we ought to send that resolution to the Department of Justice instead of to the Interstate Commerce Commission. It was thought they had too much to do. We finally sent it to the Interstate Commerce Commission, however, and it resulted, I believe, in some good, in some developments that will be beneficial.

If the resolution regarding the New York Central Railroad can not be moved, if it must either remain in the Interstate Commerce Committee's archives, or, if passed, must be returned to the Senate because we have no authority to ask the question propounded in it of the Attorney General, or ask for the information sought to be gained by it, I think perhaps a resolution of investigation of the New York Central Railroad, similar to the one that has been passed in the case of the New Haven, would perhaps result in good, if it went to the Interstate Commerce Commission, where these technicalities could not prevail.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, of course I have no way of knowing what the courts would say in any individual case to which reference has been made, or among the 1,485 consolidations which have been made since the passage of the Sherman Antitrust Act. If it were a small line, and the additional mileage were an extension of it, I presume the court would say that it is not prejudicial to the public interest, and that it did not make a monopoly, and therefore the Sherman Antitrust Act would not apply. On the other hand, if a monopoly was constituted by the consolidation, I should think the court would take the other view; and the facts in any case would have to be submitted before a decision could be reached.

What I am trying to point out is that if the court is going to act in one of these cases it would probably have to act in all of them; and this list of 1,485 consolidations does not include such consolidations as the Senator from Nebraska has referred to, notably the Nickel Plate and the Lake Shore, which took place before the passage of the Sherman Antitrust Act. Perhaps his judgment is better than mine as to the legal proposition whether that law would be retroactive or not; but my sense of justice would lead me to think it ought not to be retroactive, and therefore would not apply to such a case as he has instanced. That was the reason why I made the suggestion that I did when the resolution was under discussion.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not criticizing the Senator for making his suggestions. He may be right. I think he was wrong. I do not think the law was retroactive; but such a combination as that of the Lake Shore and the Nickel Plate is a continuing one. I think the law applies to it just as fully as though it had been organized only yesterday—because every day the combination exists, in my judgment, it is illegal.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator from Massachusetts resumes the discussion that he has prepared, I should like a little further explanation upon one point to which he has referred, and which I do not understand.

He says that the Attorney General under the administration of President Taft ordered the dismissal of the suit against the New York & New Haven Railroad and its allies because after it was brought the State of Massachusetts had validated the transaction, or some transaction. I want to be sure that he has correctly stated the history of the matter. I can not understand or perceive how the State of Massachusetts could validate a situation or condition that was contrary to a law of the United States.

Mr. WEEKS. I supposed I was stating a fact which is fairly well known. As I remember, the reason assigned by Attorney General Wickersham for dismissing that case was that the purchase of the majority interest in the Boston & Maine Railroad which was made by the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad had been authorized by an act of the Massachusetts Legislature before the purchase was made. I understand that that was the reason which he gave for dismissing the suit which had been brought in the previous administration.

Now, I may not be entirely right in my facts; I think I am, however; but what I am trying to point out is that to leave in the hands of the Department of Justice the determination of questions which are going to affect millions of people by the segregation of great properties almost at the whim of whoever happens to be the Attorney General—because here are three Attorney Generals who have taken different views of their duty in this case—is bad public policy, and will produce bad results.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts about that; but if it is true that the suit was dismissed because the State of Massachusetts had repealed a law of the United States, or had made something lawful under its laws which was unlawful under the laws of the United States, we have before us a very interesting proposition. I did not know that the Attorney General had ever assigned such a reason for the dismissal of the suit, although the Senator from Massachusetts may be right about that; but I desire to say that, in my opinion, if the combination of the Boston & Maine road with the New York & New Haven was a restraint of commerce or was a monopoly prior to the action of the State of Massachusetts, it was not less so after the action of the State; and I simply wanted to be sure that the Senator from Massachusetts had accurate information on that point.

Mr. WEEKS. I think I have stated the facts as they are. I do not think, myself, that a suit can be maintained separating these two corporations. The Boston & Maine system covers the State of Maine very largely, all the mileage in the State of New Hampshire, a portion of the mileage in the State of Vermont, and all of the mileage in the State of Massachusetts north and east of Boston. The New York, New Haven & Hartford covers all of the mileage in the State of Connecticut, all of the mileage in the State of Rhode Island, and all of the mileage in the southern part of Massachusetts up to Boston on the east, and similar points in other parts of the State, the Boston & Albany Railroad coming in between them.

These roads do not generally compete. They are extensions of one another. The New Haven Railroad, for instance, will run into the city of Worcester or the city of Springfield, and the Boston & Maine Railroad takes up the traffic and carries it on. If the combination is a monopoly and prejudicial to the public interest, then either one of these railroads is a monopoly, because it substantially covers the territory in which it is operating.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am expressing no opinion with regard to the validity of the consolidation of these roads; but I was surprised to know that the Attorney General thought that an invalid or unlawful combination under the law of the United States could be made lawful by a statute of the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not know that the Attorney General thought that the combination was unlawful; but my understanding is that that was the reason assigned for the dismissal of that case.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. NEWLANDS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield first to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, of course nobody can tell in advance of the court decision whether the New Haven system, as it has grown together, is in violation of the Federal laws or not; but that it is a question of the utmost moment and weight to all the New England States anybody can perceive. The system exists; and if it is to be broken up the consequences will be far-reaching and may be exceedingly disastrous.

If the Senator from Massachusetts will indulge me for a minute, I will read what the Hartford Courant says upon this question in its issue of yesterday. It is a very short extract.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (reading):

This Government suit against the New Haven road is a good deal like an effort to resolve a plum pudding into its constituent parts. You take out the raisins, and the almonds, and the dates, and the eggs, and the sugar, and the flour, and also whatever else may be in it, and you have a lot of second-hand ingredients which are quite worthless for any further use. But you have destroyed the plum pudding. It was the combination of all these things that made the pudding what it was—a bit of food perhaps a little trying for the digestion, but which was most agreeable to the palate. You have lost your plum pudding, and what have you got as compensation for the loss? Nothing.

So you may pull an efficiently organized transportation system apart, setting each of its varied elements off by itself, and what do you gain by that? You gain the satisfaction—such as it is—of tearing apart a business and social organism which has been slowly growing up for years, under successive public perceptions of various needs and advantages, and you have a lot of fragments left which have no life in themselves, and which taken in their separated state are practically worthless. It is wholly wicked and depraved, we suppose, to speak of bargains in the lofty ethical atmosphere now surrounding us; but this certainly does look like a bad bargain for some hundreds of thousands of people who were able to pay their rent and have a few dollars over under things as they were.

Is the New Haven system to be unscrambled in accordance with the plea filed in New Haven yesterday by the Federal Government? If it is, it will be a sad day not only for thousands of New England stockholders in the road, but for the business interests of this entire section. Do the people who live and do business on the old Air Line, the old New England and the old Central New England roads want to return to the conditions when these roads, crippled by inadequate earnings, badly equipped, unable to provide anything like decent service, struggled along with impaired rolling stock and improperly maintained roadbeds? To undo what the New Haven has done for these roads since it has taken them over and for the people whom they serve would be a performance as unwelcome as it would be difficult. Nor could it be done with fairness and justice. Money raised on New Haven credit has been liberally spent on these old roads to bring them up to date and make them fully serviceable to their communities. How is this money to be recovered if the roads are to be separated from the company which has taken them over? The old roads themselves can not pay it back. They haven't it, nor can they earn it if this dissolution suit is successful. Yet, it may be just as well that the test has come. The trial will be an expensive affair. It will mean another, and apparently needless, raid on the company's earnings; but it may in the end clear the atmosphere, and it may also prove that it is easier to make sweeping charges than to prove them.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I can imagine no stronger argument than the Senator from Connecticut has just read in favor of a permanent, continuous commission to administer, in so far as it lawfully may, the regulations of commerce.

NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN & HARTFORD RAILROAD SYSTEM.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state, also, that the article which the Senator has just read demonstrates the necessity of transferring the power of enforcing the Sherman antitrust law with reference to railroads from the Attorney General's Office to the Interstate Commerce Commission. It ought to be done under some law that will enable that commission, notwithstanding it may find a technical violation of the Sherman antitrust law, or even a substantial violation, to affirm the combination rather than to destroy it, where it would be in a higher degree to the public interest.

I quite agree with the Senator from Massachusetts. The Boston & Maine, to my eye, appears to be an extension of the New York & New Haven system, the Boston & Maine extending to the north and east of Boston and the New Haven to the south and west of Boston. I also agree with him that the original consolidation of the Boston & Maine, composed, as it is, of numerous railroads—I believe more than 100 in number—was more objectionable than the consolidation of the New York & New Haven and the Boston & Maine, and that logically, if the Attorney General is to seek to destroy the combination between the New Haven and the Boston & Maine he ought also to attack the combination resulting in the creation of the Boston & Maine and the combination resulting in the creation of the New York & New Haven, for the New York & New Haven is also composed, I believe, of more than 100 original roads. Such a course would produce chaos. Whilst all these consolidations are subject to the charge that they have resulted in exaggerated stock and bond issues, yet so far the practical administration of the roads themselves as efficient instrumentalities of commerce, I think there can hardly be a question that in most of them they have largely advanced the interests of transportation in this country.

I hope that before this debate closes the Senate will see the wisdom of putting upon one of these bills, preferably the bill relating to the securities, an amendment to the interstate commerce act transferring the enforcement of the Sherman law with reference to railroads from the Attorney General's office to the Interstate Commerce Commission and giving it some discretion, so that it will not be compelled to tear apart roads which have been put together, perhaps in violation of the Sherman antitrust law, but where the union itself has been beneficial to the public interest.

Mr. WEEKS. Many of the rates in the New England field before any consolidations had been made were substantially twice as high as they are to-day. I think the average passenger rate 40 years ago in New England was over 3 cents a mile, and now it is about 1¾ cents a mile, the lowest in the United States and the lowest in the world. While the freight rates have not been reduced to such a degree as the passenger rates, they have been very materially reduced. Any proposition for dissolving that whole network of railroads into the original parts would be a crime against the public as well as against the corporations themselves.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, when I read the extract of course I realized that it is not strictly germane to the particular bill that the Senator from Massachusetts is debating—this Federal trade commission bill—but the discussion which the able Senator from Massachusetts is making on this interrelated series of propositions shows the difficulty of keeping them unscrambled.

I agree with the Senator from Nevada and with the Senator from Massachusetts that it is very hard for these great business concerns, trying to give adequate service over a large extent of territory, to arrange their affairs and promote their extensions and keep up with the demands of increasing business under the different jurisdictions to which they are subjected. Even if the Interstate Commerce Commission had had authority at each stage of the proceedings which had been taken by this great network of New England railroads to have given its sanction to each acquisition and to have approved of each amalgamation or merger, still the whole system would have been subject to attacks by the Department of Justice just as it is to-day unless the law had been amended in some such way as suggested by the Senator from Nevada. But of course there is no such proposition here at present to take this away from the Department of Justice and confer it on the Interstate Commerce Commission. I assume if we should take that subject up in addition to the other easy little things that we are confronted with now and which we are to pass in the next day or two by unanimous consent and adjourn to fields where we are needed a great deal more perhaps than we are here, we would merge this long-continued and dreary session of Congress right into the next one and still we might be coordinating with each other on these great and extended conceptions.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Nevada, as long as there seems to be a general agreement in favor of the change which has been suggested transferring from the Department of Justice to the Interstate Commerce Commission these intricate problems relating to public service corporations, why could we not incorporate in this act a section which would make that change?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Because I do not believe that public opinion would justify it just now. Hence I am only urging practical legislation. I did say I hoped this debate would so convince the Senate of the importance of this thing that without dissension on the question we would reach legislation on this subject. I judge from the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut, who is quite hopeless on the subject, that there is no hope in that direction; and I shall content myself with the legislation now before us.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to assure the Senator that there is ten times as much public sentiment in favor of taking this question away from the hands of departmental officers and putting it in the hands of a commission as there is in favor of any part of the trade-commission bill which is now pending in the Senate.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, as long as a question has come up of the feeling in New England in regard to this transaction, I should like to take this opportunity of reading an editorial from yesterday's New York Times which covers the situation quite thoroughly.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. LIPPITT. It is entitled "New England's opinion on the New Haven case":

The action of the Federal Government in the case of the New Haven Railway may be repeated in any of several other sections of the country which now are applauding the Government's procedure. That lends countrywide interest to the contrast between opinion in New England and elsewhere. Where the merits and substance of the New Haven case are best known the opinion is least favorable. The President and the Attorney General perjudice the New Haven Railway before the country by charging it with breaking a solemn agreement upon a trivial pretext, but the Springfield Republican supports the railway. It says:

"The old law gives us clearly enough the right to appropriate railroad property in this State to State uses, but the proposition of the 'string' legislation is that the State, through majority stock holdings, may control a railroad system operating in several States. And the distinction establishes a difference worth noting. What nonsense it is to accuse the directors of culpably quibbling and unjustifiably breaking a covenant 'solemnly entered into,' and how unfair it is to fix upon them 'the sole responsibility' for whatever disastrous results to New England may ensue from a protracted dissolution suit. If there were less politics all around in the enforcement of the antitrust law, the situation would be happier to contemplate."

The Boston Transcript opposes the administration's course upon its faith in the character of the defendants whom the correspondence asperses. It recalls that their course is taken upon the advice of counsel suggested by the Department of Justice, and concludes:

"Solely because Dr. Hadley and his fellow directors are following advice of counsel, in the wisdom of which they wholly believe, the President sees fit to indict them one and all for 'failure to carry out an agreement deliberately and solemnly entered into.' The facts are against the President."

The New Haven Register accepts $10,000,000 as an estimate of the depreciation of the Boston & Maine shares by the "string" legislation, and thinks it sufficient justification of the course taken by the railway. It also condemns the lack of sympathy with the railway by the Government officials, and says:

"The President's designation of this as a slight pretext is a fair illustration of his appreciation of finance and business."

The Boston Herald says:

"The President of the United States appears not well informed on the New England railroad situation when he describes as 'inexplicable' the unwillingness of the New Haven Railroad to accept the terms of the 'string' bill."

The Hartford Courant considers the dissolution proceedings under the caption, "A crazy proposition," because "the fact is that the merger of the New England and the 'New Haven' has helped to develop New England industries and shipping facilities and has been a benefit instead of an injury."

The Boston Post alone of our New England exchanges approves the dissolution suit.

Official opinion resembles what the editors of New England say. Gov. Baldwin of Connecticut, in a public address even before the negotiations between the Government and the New Haven were broken, said the Federal action was "too drastic": "If it is necessary to require the sale of any of the property it ought to have time enough to dispose of it, if not to the best advantage, at least at a fair price. It is no case for an auction sale, rain or shine, under a red flag." These remarks apply even more strongly to the situation to-day, and the same may be said of the report made to the governor of Vermont by his appointees to the New England railroad conference. These gentlemen from Vermont wonder what can have inspired action so contrary to the interests of New England. Their conjectures regarding motives and reasons are interesting but hardly evidence. They are competent witnesses to what follows:

"The result [of the Government's action] we all know and feel. New England has suffered a loss of $200,000,000, and no one has been the gainer. Rates for freight and passengers have not decreased and railroad service has not been improved. What the compensation may be for all the loss and suffering we leave for others to answer."

Now, this is what the Times itself says:

And this official expression we find approved as heartily as the Government's action this week is disapproved. It is a fair inference that if other sections are favored by unsympathetic action like that in the New Haven case opinions elsewhere will come to resemble those above quoted. Lawbreakers must be punished, of course, and the laws must be enforced. There is no other way of discovering who are lawbreakers, and whether the law is broken, but by prosecution. So far the Government is within its rights and duties, but the manner of its procedure is making enemies for it and the law at a rate which it is friendly action to call to its attention. The President, it is safe to say, will hear of nothing like the foregoing from those who brought him to write the letter so generally disapproved.

Mr. President, I just want to add a word to that, and that is to say that I yesterday, under the date of July 22, received a copy of a letter sent to the Hon. James C. McReynolds by the Providence Chamber of Commerce, the most considerable body of business men in Rhode Island, in which they call his attention to the fact of a resolution which was passed by that body recently, as follows:

Resolved, That the Providence Chamber of Commerce believe that it is for the interest of the convenience and commerce of New England that the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railway Co. continue its operation and control of its existing steamship lines between the ports of New England and New York City; that this committee urge the Interstate Commerce Commission to enter an order permitting such continuance; and that the Secretary be instructed to transmit a copy of this resolution to said commission.

That resolution of the Providence Chamber of Commerce is in accordance with a resolution unanimously passed by the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island not long ago asserting that the control of the steamships by the New Haven Road was in accordance with the traditional policy of Rhode Island and of New England in building up its transportation facilities and urgently requesting that it be not broken up.

I am informed that there are more than a hundred business associations of various kinds in New England that have protested against the separation of these steamship lines from the New Haven Railroad.

About two years ago I received and put in the RECORD of this body a protest against the separation of these steamship lines from the New Haven signed by an extraordinarily large number of the largest shippers and business interests of Rhode Island, Fall River, and various parts of Massachusetts and of New England. I want to say that so far as I know about it the sentiment is almost unanimous in that community against the action that is being taken looking to the separation of those steamship lines from the New Haven.

Now, I merely wish to call attention to one more matter, and that is the fact, Mr. President, that in what is now being done it seems to me the stockholders of the New Haven Road are being badly treated. The stockholders of that road number somewhere in the neighborhood of 25,000 people. They are almost entirely natives of New England, of Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts. The average holdings are less than 100 shares to an individual. They are very largely women, people of small means, trust estates held for minors, and people who have invested in the New Haven stock because they felt that it was something from which they would get an assured income.

Certain unfortunate occurrences have brought about such a situation of the New Haven that the road is no longer paying those dividends, and it is asserted that owing to the action of Mr. Mellen and Mr. Morgan particularly the New Haven stockholders have suffered a severe loss on account of the purchase of the Rhode Island trolleys, of the Boston & Maine, and of the Westchester at too high a price.

Mr. President, there are two ways in which the stockholders of that road can be injured. One is by the purchase of something at too high a price. The other is by the sale of something at too low a price.

Mr. WEEKS. That something is the same something.

Mr. LIPPITT. And that something, as the Senator from Massachusetts very well says, is the same something.

Now, the suit which the Attorney General has just inaugurated is in consequence of a disagreement between the Department of Justice and the present directors of the road as to the wisdom of selling some of its securities. The present directors of the road are an entirely different board in many respects from that which had charge of the road in the past, and are endeavoring to rehabilitate it. I think I am safe in saying the most important business of these directors is to protect the stockholders of that road, to assist them, if possible, to recover some of the losses they have sustained, and that is as much, almost, for the benefit of the general public as it is for the stockholders. With this duty plainly apparent, the directors certainly would not be justified in consenting to the sale of the road's property at a price that would be too low, even though they may have been bought, as the accusation is, at too high a price.

Mr. President, the Rhode Island trolleys the sale of which it is proposed to compel have within my own recollection increased within 20 years in value from about $250,000 up to a point where some people in Philadelphia, if my recollection is correct, were willing to purchase them at somewhere in the neighborhood of $10,000,000; and further on, to a point where the then directors of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad thought that they were worth $20,000,000. That has been the growth in value of those trolleys within such a short period as 20 years. Providence and Rhode Island generally and all that section of New England which they serve have had for 30 years one of the most steady growths in population and in value of any part of our country. It is now proposed to compel the sale of those trolleys at any price that may be obtained; in other words, as the editorial which I have read calls it, they are to be "put upon the bargain counter." If that is done, the possibility of the stockholders of this road ever recouping the loss, if there is a loss, incurred by the purchase of those trolleys is absolutely nothing. If the directors of the road are allowed to hold these and other properties or to sell them according to their good judgment as may be for the best interest of their stockholders, a time may well come when instead of that purchase being one disastrous for the stockholders of that road, they may not only get all their money back, but find that they have a handsome profit in addition.

What will be the position of the Interstate Commerce Commission before this country if the sale is insisted upon and five years from now it turns out that somebody has bought those trolleys for perhaps $10,000,000 and is able to again resell them for $20,000,000? Who, then, will be responsible for the loss that the stockholders of that road will suffer?

Mr. President, it seems to me that as regards this situation there has been an extraordinary and a most intemperate attack upon the New Haven Railroad. I do not know from what source that attack has been instigated, but it bears all the earmarks of an organized attempt to depreciate the value of the New Haven securities. The parties who are going to suffer in this matter are those whom the Government claims it is trying to protect as a result of these suits. Mr. Mellen is not going to be injured by any suit that is brought to dissolve the New Haven Railroad; Mr. Morgan is not going to be injured by any such suit; it will be simply the innocent stockholders of that railroad who will be injured.

I confess that I feel very strongly about the matter. I think that from a business standpoint, if I may say so, it is a "raw deal" to those stockholders; and I think that the directors, whose business it is to protect them, should have a free hand in doing so.

As for the charges of monopoly that are brought against the New Haven Railroad, of course it is a monopoly. Every railroad in this country is a monopoly. As the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has well said, there is scarcely a railroad system in this country that has not been consolidated in technical violation of the law; and it seems to me a very inappropriate time from the standpoint of the stockholders and of their proper interests for the Department of Justice to now single out this particular road to enforce a law, the violation of which, if it is a violation, is being overlooked elsewhere. If the representatives of the Government would consult with the present management of the road in a friendly spirit for the purpose of rehabilitating the property and protecting the innocent sufferers from the present situation, we would soon see a different condition of affairs. I am not suggesting any protection for anyone who may have done wrong, but the punishment of the guilty and the breaking up of the system are entirely different matters.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator wishes to ask a question, I will yield. Otherwise I think I had better go on.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Massachusetts has been very courteous in yielding, and so long as he had the floor I did not suppose that he desired to speak. [Laughter.] I desire to answer at some length what has been said by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT], but, of course, I shall not intrude on the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska entirely misconstrues my purpose in making this address. I have some general observations to submit on this question, and I should have been glad to have submitted them without interruption; yet I recognize the fact that frequently the discussion which is brought out, as was the case last night, is of quite as much value as, or even more value than, a carefully prepared speech. Therefore I have been liberal—I think all Senators will agree that I have been extraliberal—in yielding to others; but I have not done so for the purpose of delaying action. I have done so because I wish to bring about action that will be intelligent and reasonable when we finally conclude this legislation.

Before I proceed, however, I want to say that I am in substantial sympathy with everything which the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] has said about the situation of the stockholders of the New Haven road; and it is a fair conclusion to come to that they have some rights which the Government should consider and protect in the suits which have been brought.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. KENYON. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, when I was interrupted I was discussing some features of the Sherman Antitrust Act, which I will continue.

Sight should not be lost of the fact that the principle which governs the Sherman Antitrust Act, namely, one of prohibition, is negatived by the principle involved in this act which is one of regulation. There can be no doubt that the surest way to unsettle sound economic conditions would be to involve these two theories in legislation connected with governmental activities. In this whole series of legislation the administration's purpose seems to be to travel two different roads at the same time by increasing the effectiveness of the prohibitions of the antitrust law, while providing for supervisory authority in the Federal trade commission bill. The involving of these two principles will mean, in my judgment, unlimited discord, uncertainty, and, therefore, harm to business operations. We should either take one horn of the dilemma or the other. I would elaborate this argument still further if it had not already been better stated than I can state it by the President himself, who is now urging this legislation. In his "New Freedom," published in 1912, he discusses the question involved in this trade commission bill with a fullness and certainty of conclusion which do not seem to be in accord with the present purposes of the bill, which undoubtedly has his approval; and one is led to wonder what could have modified the views so strongly expressed when he was a candidate for the Presidency.

I now desire to read a few extracts from the "New Freedom" to indicate that the President, when a candidate, seemed to have in mind this thought alone, that the policy to be followed should be a thorough destruction of monopoly; that there should be no partnership with monopoly of any kind, and yet, while the Attorney General of the United States in the last administration, Mr. Wickersham, in the very last days of the administration, publicly stated that in casually going over Moody's Manual he had found 100 cases where there was prima facie evidence that monopoly existed, this administration in 16 months has brought but 14 suits of all kinds to prevent what the President so definitely declaims against in the paragraphs which I am about to quote:

The third party—

Meaning the Progressive Party, I assume—

The third party says that the present system of our industry and trade has come to stay. Mind you, these artificially built-up things, these things that can't maintain themselves in the market without monopoly, have come to stay, and the only thing that the Government can do, the only thing that the third party proposes should be done, is to set up a commission to regulate them. It accepts them. It says: "We will not undertake—it were futile to undertake—to prevent monopoly, but we will go into an arrangement by which we will make these monopolies kind to you. We will guarantee that they shall be pitiful. We will guarantee that they shall pay the right wages. We will guarantee that they shall do everything kind and public-spirited, which they have never heretofore shown the least inclination to do.

Now follows the President's comment:

Don't you realize that that is a blind alley? You can't find your way to liberty that way. You can't find your way to social reform through which the life of this country shall be justly and happily de-

The fundamental part of such a program is that the trusts shall be recognized as a permanent part of our economic order, and that the Government shall try to make trusts the ministers, the instruments, through which the life of this country shall be justly and happily developed on its industrial side.

And yet this legislation is not intended, as I understand, to carry out the purposes of that declaration, but it is designed to do just what the President criticized the third party for advocating at that time. He goes on to say:

If the Government is to tell big business men how to run their business, then don't you see that big business men have to get closer to the Government even than they are now? Don't you see that they must capture the Government in order not to be restrained too much by it?

"Must capture the Government." In other words, what we are proposing now, namely, to restrain unfair methods of competition, is just what the President says will give business men control of the Government, which he declaims against so strongly.

He goes on to say:

At the least, under the plan I am opposing, there will be an avowed partnership between the Government and the trusts. I take it that the firm will be ostensibly controlled by the senior member. For I take it that the Government of the United States is at least the senior member, though the younger member has all along been running the business. But when all the momentum, when all the energy, when a great deal of the genius, as so often happens in partnerships the world over, is with the junior partner, I do not think that the superintendence of the senior partner is going to amount to very much. And I do not believe that benevolence can be read into the hearts of the trusts by the superintendence and suggestions of the Federal Government, because the Government has never within my recollection had its suggestions accepted by the trusts. On the contrary, the suggestions of the trusts have been accepted by the Government.

Yet we are going to permit these people to continue their competition under our supervision. In other words, we are doing by this legislation exactly what the President again complains of and declaims against.

He goes on to say, further:

Inasmuch, therefore, as I hope and intend to interfere with monopoly just as much as possible—

He has interfered in 14 cases in 16 months, when Attorney General Wickersham said there was prima facie evidence in 100 cases in just casually glancing over Moody's Manual—

I can not subscribe to arrangements by which they know that it will not be disturbed.

The Roosevelt plan is that there shall be an industrial commission charged with the supervision of the great monopolistic combinations which have been formed under the protection of the tariff, and that the Government of the United States shall see to it that these gentlemen who have conquered labor shall be kind to labor. I find, then, the proposition to be this, that there shall be two masters, the great corporation, and over it the Government of the United States; and I ask who is going to be master of the Government of the United States? It has a master now—those who in combination control these monopolies. And if the Government, controlled by the monopolies, in its turn controls the monopolies, the partnership is finally consummated.

I do not care how benevolent the master is going to be; I will not live under a master. That is not what America was created for. America was created in order that every man should have the same chance as every other man to exercise mastery over his own fortunes. (The New Freedom, pp. 193–207.)

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make one suggestion?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HOLLIS. If the Senator will read the three pending trust bills, he will find that there is not one line or syllable in any one of them that countenances monopoly in any way. They are merely additional and supplemental acts to the already existing laws on those subjects. They are intended not to regulate monopoly, but to prohibit it, and to prohibit those practices which will lead to and encourage it.

Mr. WEEKS. I have read all three of the bills. Perhaps I have not read them understandingly. I am quite frank to say that no action is taken to change directly in any way the monopoly features of the Sherman Antitrust Act; but I do say that the measure we are now considering is the antithesis of the Sherman Antitrust Act; that the one would naturally commence where the other leaves off; that they deal with the control and the regulation of corporations in entirely different ways; that there is not anything in the proposed legislation, if I understand it, which would prevent monopoly, but it will permit monopoly to continue as it has up to the present time, simply saying, "You must compete fairly." As I have repeated once or twice, the course of the administration seems to bear out that conclusion; for, as I have suggested, we have had only 14 suits in 16 months of the administration brought to restrain or destroy monopoly.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HUGHES. Does the Senator know of any trust which has been successfully launched and successfully operated which has not owed its success or apparent success to unfair practices?

Mr. WEEKS. I think, if I understand the Senator's question, that there are great numbers which have not had to do with unfair practices in any way.

Mr. HUGHES. I should like to have the Senator name one.

Mr. WEEKS. I have submitted a list of 1,485 consolidations of railroads; and if the Attorney General wished to proceed against monopolies there are 1,485 opportunities for him to do so.

Mr. HUGHES. Of course the Senator is discussing one thing, and I am discussing another. I was not thinking, I will say, of railroads; but I do not know of any trust that has been launched and has been successfully operated which does not depend or has not in the past depended for its success on the commission of acts which would be condemned by anybody's definition of what constitutes unfair competition.

Mr. WEEKS. I think it would take a long time to go into that discussion. Quite likely my conclusions might not be accepted by the Senator from New Jersey; but my judgment is that there are a great many combinations which have reduced prices as a result of the combination, and that therefore they have been for the public good.

Mr. HUGHES. That is not what I am talking about, either. The Senator is apparently criticizing the President of the United States on the theory that the proposed legislation and the statement of the President are irreconcilable; and I wanted to find out just on what he based that contention.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think they can not be reconciled, but I think they are inconsistent.

Mr. HUGHES. That is just the point I was trying to make.

Mr. WEEKS. I think if the President were consistent he would direct the Department of Justice to proceed against all combinations of all kinds which militate against the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. HUGHES. Would the Senator have that done in the face of the Supreme Court decision?

Mr. WEEKS. Well, I have my own opinion about what the results would be.

Mr. HUGHES. Exactly.

Mr. WEEKS. But the law is on the statute books; and I have suggested to the Senator from Nevada to-day that if he would modify the Sherman Antitrust Act he would, in my judgment, be doing more for the business interests of the country than by all of the legislation which we are contemplating.

Mr. HUGHES. The Sherman Antitrust Act has been pretty well modified—at least, that is the general opinion—by the recent decision of the Supreme Court. It seems to me the Senator must know that as well as I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I have not any doubt in my mind that the recent decisions of the Supreme Court in the Tobacco and Standard Oil cases were in exact conformity with the opinions of the men who framed the Sherman Antitrust Act and put it on the statute books. I have submitted a statement made by former Senator Edmunds, who was chairman of the Judiciary Committee at that time, which corroborates that statement. I have submitted testimony from Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, who was a member of the committee, which corroborates that statement.

Mr. HUGHES. I will say to the Senator that it seems to me quite apparent that those distinguished gentlemen were perfectly capable of writing the word "unreasonable" into the Sherman Act if they had wanted to have it there.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Massachusetts is usually fair. He is always candid. I am very sorry to hear him characterize the proposed legislation as an attempt to regulate monopoly.

I am not interested in reconciling the inconsistencies of the President of the United States. I think his views as formerly expressed are not in entire harmony with those which he has recently expressed; but that does not affect the value of the legislation which is now before the Senate.

I am in favor of part of this legislation. There are some provisions in some of these bills which I do not favor, and I will make them known as time goes on.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to inject here, Mr. President, that I am in the same position that the Senator from Iowa is. There are some provisions in these three bills which I would favor.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I do not believe there is a single provision in any of the bills intended to encourage or protect monopoly, or that can by any possibility encourage or protect monopoly. The bill that we have before us is not a regulation of monopoly in any of its parts. It is not intended to permit monopoly to exist and then prescribe the terms or conditions upon which it may operate or do business. It is intended to destroy the monopolies that are now with us and to prevent the establishment of other monopolies.

Some of us may believe that the antitrust law, so called, is all the legislation we need in order to accomplish those purposes. I am not one of them. I am inherently and by training opposed to monopoly in all its forms, but we must be fair about this bill. I take it that nothing but section 5, or the unfair-competition proposition, was in the mind of the Senator from Massachusetts when he spoke of the bill in the way he did.

Unfair competition is the antithesis or the opposite of free, fair competition. It is that condition which we desire to preserve. It is that condition which, in my opinion, this bill will help to establish and preserve. Unfair competition may not always tend toward monopoly, but unfair competition always destroys the effect of fair competition.

While the Senator from Massachusetts may not agree with me, and while I value his judgment very highly with regard to the propriety of establishing new regulations, yet inasmuch as we have a statute which is directed against the restraint of trade as forcibly and as completely as any statute could be directed against an evil—a statute which is directed against monopoly and all attempts to monopolize as emphatically as a statute could be directed toward such purposes—and inasmuch as that statute is to remain unimpaired, untouched, with all its vigor, and we now propose to make a new offense which is intended to prevent unfair competition, I can not quite understand how the Senator from Massachusetts can characterize a bill of that kind as a proposition to regulate monopoly.

The party to which the Senator referred in the extracts from which he read I think did propose to regulate monopoly. It proposed to allow monopolistic power and to shield the people from the effect of the power by establishing prices at which these enterprises should sell their commodities to the public; and repeatedly the advocates of that party have likened the commission which should be established to supervise industry to the commission which we have established to supervise railroads. We have given to the latter commission the power to fix the price at which the service shall be rendered; and in a general way I understand the political party to which reference is made in these extracts proposes to do the same thing with regard to industry, to curb the power and limit the avarice of monopoly by saying, "You can not charge for your service or your commodity more than thus and thus."

I am as unalterably opposed to any such proposition as the Senator from Massachusetts can possibly be. I do not want a commission imposed upon the industry of this country which recognizes a monopoly and attempts to check its ravages in that way. I do, however, want a commission that will supervise a certain part of the enforcement or administration of the law which is intended to prevent the monopoly from coming into existence at all; and I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will distinguish between the commission which is proposed in the bill now before us and a commission which would be given the same powers over industry and its prices as we have already given to the Interstate Commerce Commission over railroads or common carriers and their prices.

I suggest this because I felt there was some danger, in view of the very persuasive manner in which the Senator from Massachusetts was dealing with this subject, of the impression going out that those of us who believed in this commission were followers of the further proposal that a trade commission should be given the same power over manufactures and commodities of all kinds that we have given to a commission over a public duty such as is performed by common carriers.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa of course knows that I had no intention of making unfair statements, even by inference, and I have no doubt he has in his mind just exactly what he has expressed in regard to this proposed legislation, but I am taking the situation as it is. What is the administration doing? Is it proceeding to destroy monopoly by bringing suits? Not to any extent. Only in 14 minor cases have suits been brought in 16 months. Now we are proposing legislation which is going to deal with business concerns in, I think, a different way. The Senator from Iowa may be correct, and possibly both laws will be enforced to the limit. I hope they will be if they are put on the statute books. I believe, however, that the enforcement of the Sherman Antitrust Act will be substantially stopped and this law will take its place, and we will be doing just the reverse of what the Senator from Iowa has in mind. That is to say, we will be doing what the President charges in the extracts I have read to be the belief and the intention of the third party. Of course, time alone can determine who and what is right in that respect.

I have gone into the Sherman Antitrust Act in considerable detail in order to indicate to what extent uncertainty exists, even after the law has been in operation 24 years and notwithstanding the fact that many attorneys feel that the court has now passed on a sufficient number of cases so that if any business man now breaks the law he does it intentionally; in other words, that the path has been blazed with sufficient accuracy to enable any honest business man who wishes to comply with the law to do so. That is true in many directions, and yet we find the highest authorities disagreeing about the force of recent decisions, and I predict that it will be many years before the courts will have completely cleared the atmosphere which surrounds the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. President, I want to take up another phase of this question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator yield to me before he passes to that?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator has read certain views of the President expressed during the campaign which were critical of the Progressive Party program and of the views of the candidate of the Progressive Party for the Presidency, and he claims that the views now entertained by the President are inconsistent with the views which he expressed there, and the Senator from Iowa indicates that it is not his disposition to reconcile the alleged inconsistency. I wish to say that there is no inconsistency.

The Senator will realize that the proposal of this trade commission bill is a very different one from that urged by the Progressive movement and by Mr. Roosevelt as the head of that movement. This commission is organized for the enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law by aiding the courts in the preparation of decrees and in the dissolution of these trusts, by aiding the Attorney General in his work in enforcing the antitrust law, by investigations under which it is the duty of the commission to call the attention of the Attorney General to any violation of the antitrust law with a view to securing his action as to its enforcement, and a further provision contained in section 5 which takes hold of unfair practices in competition that tend toward the creation of monopoly by the destruction of fair competition.

It will be seen, therefore, that this is not a substitute for the antitrust law but is in aid of the enforcement of the antitrust law and is intended to take hold of those practices in trade which inevitably in the end lead toward the creation of a monopoly and the increase of monopolistic power.

The regulation which was recommended by the Progressive movement and by Mr. Roosevelt looked toward the recognition of these great combinations and practically to their validation, and also looked to the regulation of them just as the Government now regulates such public utilities as the railway system, looking to a regulation of monopoly, even to the extent of the control of prices. It was with reference to that kind of a regulation that the President in the campaign made these utterances.

I claim that there is nothing whatever inconsistent in the position which the President now takes as compared with the position that he then took, but on the contrary the positions are not inconsistent with each other. The President is advocating now the absolute enforcement of the antitrust law through additional machinery and the destruction of unfair competition as an aid to monopoly whilst he condemns the policy which would validate combinations and monopoly and seek to regulate them in the interest of society by the regulation of not only their practices but their prices.

Now, will the Senator let me say one word further before he passes to another phase, and that is with reference to the action of the Attorney General regarding the New York & New Haven Railroad? I fear that what I said might be regarded as a criticism upon the Attorney General's office for its recent action. I will say that my criticism is of the law which intrusts the enforcement of the Sherman law to the Attorney General, not of the action of the Attorney General. I think that that portion of the law with reference to railroads ought to be intrusted to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and with reference to trade incorporations it should be intrusted to the commission which we are about to create. I have no fault to find with the action of the Attorney General who found himself face to face with a consolidation which, entirely outside of the mooted question as to whether the consolidation of the Boston & Maine with the New York & New Haven constitutes a violation of the Sherman antitrust law, involved consolidations that were plainly in violation of the law, the acquisition of the electric lines and the boat lines, which were clearly in active competition with the New York & New Haven and the Boston & Maine system.

I regret, of course, that we have to go along with the brutal enforcement of the law at a time when the condition of the innocent stockholders of the New York & New Haven Railroad system cries out for relief, and I would be glad to have some change made in this proposed law that would enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to take hold of this question in a humane way, with a view of organizing that entire system in some possible manner in harmony with the law, and at the same time protecting and preserving the rights of the innocent stockholders, whose property is now in great peril as the result, possibly, of forced sales.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is always a pleasure to listen to the Senator from Nevada, because the words with which he seeks to drug people into insensibility to all dangers contained in his projects are mellifluous, and if one will allow himself to be carried along by the iridescent optimism that always pervades the Senator, he can be induced to vote for almost anything.

Of course, in the opinion of the Senator, when the Interstate Commerce Commission takes hold of a monopoly to rend it into its fragments and constituents it is a humane and perfectly delightful operation and dissection process. If this is a monopoly, it will be rent apart. It will be no business of the Interstate Commerce Commission, if it is ever clothed with the enforcement of the Sherman law, to patch it up in some way, so that it will continue to be a monopoly; it will be dismembered.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator will recollect that I said I hoped that would be done by some modifications of the law which would enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine the question of public interest where consolidations had been perfected and where it would work greater injury to the public to destroy it and rend it apart than to allow it to be maintained.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Simply words, Mr. President, words! The Senator hopes that something will be enforced to break up something so that it will promote the public interest. Nothing but words! No tribunal in this country is given authority to have a roving commission to "promote the public interest" as it may happen from minute to minute to think is "the public interest." A commission must have some definite authority, and it is going to be confined to one or the other of the three branches of this Government, and no benevolent despots are to be allowed to roam about with an eclectic commission to fix things so that they will run smoothly according to their notions of what may be "ethical" or not "antisocial" or for the "public interest," or any of those "goo-goo" phrases. This is a Government of law and not of men.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. THOMAS. What was that commission?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is for the Senator from Massachusetts to say whether he yields.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Connecticut mentioned a commission just now which I never heard of before. What was the commission?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was not aware that I mentioned it.

Mr. THOMAS. Eclectic?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I did, I hope the Senator will be able to grasp what it meant.

Mr. THOMAS. I thought I had heard of the name of all, but that was a new one to me.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator need not lay that balm to his soul. He has not heard of half the commissions. I had here, and I am sorry I just sent it to my committee room, a copy of the Outlook, or the Output, with four great coordinate national commissions, which it says must be elevated to the dignity of departments of the Government.

Mr. THOMAS. I have those here. I received a copy of those.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well. There was one there that I had not heard of before. I have no doubt if we establish this Federal trade commission there will be no dearth in the incubator factory. Somebody will think of something else that ought to be regulated by a commission. I believe there is an amendment somewhere in print for a rivers and harbors commission, which in some way was to fix it so that the "pork barrel" will be divided up to the satisfaction, "humanely" of course, of the river and harbor commission. How they are going to get the money out of the Federal Treasury without the apportionment being satisfactory to Congress I do not know, but I have no doubt there will be no difficulty; it will be perfectly simple, and everything will be lovely after we get it established.

Now, this commission——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do, if I can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for a question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator has only humor and satire for those who attempt to do anything in reference to relieving serious conditions. Now, the Senator is addressing himself to the question of the New York & New Haven system.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator realizes——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Massachusetts has yielded to the Senator from Nevada for a question, and that is what I yielded for.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator whether he can suggest any method by which the New York & New Haven Railroad system can be brought out of the existing complication? What does the Senator say?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I decline to discuss the question here as utterly irrelevant, and I decline to yield for a question I am not discussing.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand the Senator declines to yield because he has nothing to suggest.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is none of my business; it is the Department of Justice that is attending to its business.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the Senator approve of the proceedings that are now pending?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have not given it any attention, because I try to confine my attention to my own business.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As a Senator from the State of Connecticut the Senator is exceedingly concerned about the economic condition of that region.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am, but I can not help it. Congress has passed a law under which the Attorney General is prosecuting, and the court is going to decide whether the Attorney General and the administration are right in their allegations. I know nothing about it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator is entirely satisfied with the conditions as they exist there?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am entirely satisfied to mind my own business, and I am not giving legal opinions on things I do not know anything about. It is trouble enough for me to try to find out what conundrums are now pending before this body, where I have some business, which I am trying to perform, and my wits are pretty nearly used up in the contemplation of these conundrums. I am trying to get some light on them.

I have just been looking to see what this pending commission is called to do, which the Senator says is to stop unfair competition which "tends to monopoly." Of course it is not authorized to do any such thing. It is authorized and directed to prevent corporations from using "unfair methods of competition in commerce," and there is not anything about a monopoly or the Sherman law in this section 5. There is what I regard as a mischievous, meddlesome provision later on, that if a court does not know how to make its own judgment or decree after it has decided a suit it may call upon the commission to frame it. That, in my judgment, is a piece of impertinence to the court and is not called for in this bill. But they are called upon to decide what is unfair.

It has been said here that "unfair" would not be limited to that narrow and restricted zone which the judiciary has heretofore occupied in the definition of "unfair competition," but would be defined according to its meaning in the English language. Therefore I have had recourse to the Century Dictionary, which is one authority upon the English language, to see what it means. The President in his message upon this subject demands that a fixed rule or standard shall be laid down for the guidance of the commission and the business man. I find "unfair" means—

> Not fair; not beautiful; not comely. Not glad; sad; sorrowful. Not honest; not impartial; disingenuous; using trick or artifice.
> "You come, like an unfair merchant, to charge me with being in your debt"—

I do not know whether it is unfair to claim that a man owes you anything if he does owe you—

> Not based on honesty, justice, or fairness; inequitable: as, unfair advantages; unfair practices. Synonyms.—Unjust, inequitable, partial, one-sided, dishonest, dishonorable.

That is the meaning of "unfair" competition. This commission is to have absolute authority to order a man to stop an unfair method, and if he has the presumption not to keep out of trouble (and the Senator from Nevada says he can keep out of trouble, if he obeys the order of the commission and ruins his business), but has the presumption to disobey the order of the commission, then the commission goes to the court and gets an injunction against him, and the court sends him to jail for contempt of court in the violation of the injunction. That is the definite rule of guidance which the President says the experience of the country warrants the Congress in fixing for the guidance of the business man.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I want to turn now to the discussion of another phase of this question. Before doing so I wish to suggest that I have no doubt that the Senator from Nevada and other members of the committee, the majority members of the committee, feel that this legislation is desirable and necessary. The President thinks so, and he submitted a message to Congress which is the incentive which has brought forth all these bills, changed from time to time. In fact, I suspect, if you take all the amendments that have been submitted to this bill since it has been presented to the Senate and compare them with the terms of the bill itself, the authors of the bill would not know it if they were incorporated in it.

Most of these suggestions come from that class of reformers who never have been in business and do not know anything about business and never earned a dollar in their lives. I see them around this Capitol preparing amendments and doing other things to perfect this legislation, of which they have no comprehension, in my judgment.

What I have said several times, and I repeat now, is that unfortunately there crept into the Democratic national platform something about trusts, so very indefinite that it might possibly be observed to the satisfaction of every Senator. That happened a year ago last summer. Since that time there has not developed and there is not now any real business sentiment in this country in favor of this legislation. I am going to try to demonstrate that that is true, notwithstanding the statements made by the President in his message and statements that have been made on this floor by Senators that it is all-important.

I want to read extracts from what the President said. I wish I had the time to read the whole message, but Senators have read it, so it is unnecessary:

> In my report "on the state of the Union," which I had the privilege of reading to you on the 2d of December last, I ventured to reserve for discussion at a later date the subject of additional legislation regarding the very difficult and intricate matter of trusts and monopolies. The time now seems opportune to turn to that great question.

> Constructive legislation, when successful, is always the embodiment of convincing experience, and of the mature public opinion which finally springs out of that experience.

> Legislation is a business of interpretation, not of origination; and it is now plain what the opinion is to which we must give effect in this matter. It is not recent or hasty opinion.

> What we are purposing to do, therefore, is, happily, not to hamper or interfere with business as enlightened business men prefer to do it, or in any sense to put it under the ban. The antagonism between business and government is over. We are now about to give expression to the best business judgment of America, to what we know to be the business conscience and honor of the land. The Government and business men are ready to meet each other halfway in a common effort to square business methods with both public opinion and the law.

> The business of the country awaits also, has long awaited and has suffered because it could not obtain, further and more explicit legislative definition of the policy and meaning of the existing antitrust law. Nothing hampers business like uncertainty. Nothing daunts or discourages it like the necessity to take chances, to run the risk of falling under the condemnation of the law before it can make sure just what the law is. Surely we are sufficiently familiar with the actual processes and methods of monopoly and of the many hurtful restraints of trade to make definition possible, at any rate up to the limits of what experience has disclosed. These practices, being now abundantly disclosed, can be explicitly and item by item forbidden by statute in such terms as will practically eliminate uncertainty, the law itself and the penalty being made equally plain.

> I have laid the case before you, no doubt as it lies in your own mind, as it lies in the thought of the country. What must every candid man say of the suggestions I have laid before you, of the plain obligations of which I have reminded you? That these are new things for which the country is not prepared? No; but that they are old things, now familiar, and must of course be undertaken if we are to square our laws with the thought and desire of the country. Until these things are done, conscientious business men the country over will be unsatisfied. They are in these things our mentors and colleagues. We are now about to write the additional articles of our constitution of peace, the peace that is honor and freedom and prosperity.

Mr. President, in my judgment the President stands on the shore of the ocean of business and he views the jetsam and flotsam coming in and thinks that is business; but that is what has been cast out by business, which has been thrown overboard in order to save business. He has not had business experience—it is no criticism of him to say that—and neither have those who are most intimately advising him had the business experience to justify any such assertions as he makes in that message. He does have occasionally men come to the White House to consult with him about business methods—men like Mr. Ford, for instance. Mr. Ford, by a keen perception of what the public requires, has been able to make an enormous fortune and do a business which does not depend on ordinary conditions. He never has had to consider the shoals or the currents or the other impediments with which every navigator in business has to contend. He has had smooth sailing in his business career since he commenced to manufacture automobiles. The average man, in my judgment, who goes to see the President of the United States to talk with him about business knows before he goes there what the President's ideas are, and he gives the President what he thinks the President wants; and, in my judgment, the President does not get from the business men of the country what they actually think should be done under such conditions and circumstances.

I am going to submit to the Senate, if I have the time, proof of the assertion which I have just made.

It is undeniable that while the press and business men are uncertain as to the possible value of the proposed trust legislation, the strong sentiment of the country is against any further action at present, and if it were properly put up to business sentiment I have no doubt that they would demand a careful investigation before any further legislation is adopted.

The Chicago Herald, under date of July 1, prints some replies to the Chicago Chamber of Commerce suggestions, which show the indecision but the general trend against any legislation. In only one instance is the plan of the President to pass trust legislation entirely approved, and that from the town with the significant name "Devils Lake, N. Dak."

It is almost certain that those who are framing these bills and who have necessarily given their best attention to them can not have had experience in many lines of business. Does it not seem most unwise to proceed with legislation which is undigested, not entirely intelligent, and for which most people feel there is no demand? The hearings before the Senate and House committees on this subject form a convincing argument to the assertion that there is not any legitimate demand for it. Practically speaking, those who appeared for the legislation were confined to those theorists who find something wrong in everything and who believe that those wrongs can be corrected by legislation which has not been sufficiently studied to determine whether it applies to any or many of the activities of life. On the other hand, those who have definite knowledge have almost universally opposed the legislation and denied the necessity for it.

I am going to read a few of these extracts from the opinions which were published in the Chicago Herald.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the voice of the Senator from Massachusetts striking the empty seats on the Democratic side produces an echo that is not entirely agreeable. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). The Senator from New Hampshire makes the point of no quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Norris	Smoot
Borah	Hollis	Perkins	Sterling
Brandegee	Hughes	Pomerene	Stone
Bristow	Jones	Ransdell	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Reed	Swanson
Clark, Wyo.	Kern	Saulsbury	Thomas
Clarke, Ark.	Lane	Shafroth	Thornton
Colt	Lea, Tenn.	Sheppard	Vardaman
Crawford	Martine, N. J.	Shively	Walsh
Cummins	Myers	Simmons	Weeks
Gallinger	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.	West

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. NEWLANDS, Mr. PAGE, Mr. POINDEXTER, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia answered to their names when called.

Mr. BRADY, Mr. CAMDEN, and Mr. BRYAN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, when the call for a quorum was made I was about to read some of the opinions which the Chicago Record-Herald has obtained from business associations throughout the country. I do not intend to include very many of these opinions in my comments, but these are so scattered in the locations from which they come, and so different are the reasons which are given that I think they are worth considering as a fair statement of what business organizations throughout the western section of the country are thinking in regard to this legislation. The first one is from the Kokomo Chamber of Commerce, and it says:

Kokomo Chamber of Commerce: Association of commerce plan indorsed, with recommendation that trade commission act in advisory as well as judicial capacity. Government policy should be more advice and cooperation and less harassment and prosecution. Important legislation should be effected so that business may know its code of rules.

The next is from the Superior Commercial Club of Wisconsin, and is as follows:

WISCONSIN.

Superior Commercial Club: Sentiment against further trust or class legislation, though in accord with association of commerce suggestions. Conservative action is essential to business interests and to end present uncertainty.

The one I shall now read is from the Kalamazoo Commercial Club:

MICHIGAN.

Kalamazoo Commercial Club: Sherman Act considered adequate and Clayton bill full of unwise and harmful provisions. Postponement of trust legislation to next session favored, leaving matter in hands of commission.

Not the commission proposed in this bill, but a commission to consider the subject.

United States Chamber of Commerce stand approved.

I now read from the St. Louis Business Men's League, of St. Louis, Mo.:

MISSOURI.

St. Louis Business Men's League: Forwarded resolution to Missouri Senators and Representatives declaring against passage of further legislation at this session, and asserting that regulation of business along new and untried lines might jeopardize country's general welfare.

This is from the Minot Association of Commerce:

Minot Association of Commerce: Antitrust laws sufficient if enforced. Not in favor of trades commission; should be handled by Department of Justice. Favors legislation that will discourage mail-order houses from misrepresenting merchandise so as to put country merchant out of business.

I now read from the Moorhead (Minn.) Commercial Club:

MINNESOTA.

Moorhead Commercial Club: Opinion practically unanimous that pressing trust legislation at this time does more harm than good, and that the country is suffering from plethora of lawmaking and unintelligent legislation.

As I have said, in some 40 or 50 such expressions of opinion published in the Chicago Record-Herald the only one that was at all favorable to this legislation came from Devils Lake, N. Dak., and it says:

NORTH DAKOTA.

Devils Lake Commercial Club: Business men stand squarely behind the President in his program of trust legislation. That the trust question should be permanently remedied without compromise is the sentiment of this section of North Dakota.

I see the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is in his seat. He can probably explain the reason why the citizens of that section of his own State seem to take a different view of this question from all other commercial organizations.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that Devils Lake is very close to my home. I know of no reason why its citizens should favor this particular legislation in that section more than any other, except that the president of a subsidiary railroad, who lives at Devils Lake, is a distinguished Democrat, and undoubtedly approves of this legislation or of any legislation proposed by the Democratic Party.

I might also explain that there is a prominent Democrat in that city who is a candidate for a certain office. Furthermore, the Treasurer of the United States lives at Devils Lake. Those three reasons might perhaps be the cause of this petition demanding this particular legislation.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, to continue the evidence that there is not any substantial sentiment in favor of this legislation, I want to put into the RECORD the report of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, as far as it applies to the three questions which were submitted by the chamber. These questions were submitted to all of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

First: The committee recommended that there be no attempt by statute to forbid discriminations in prices of commodities.

The replies to that were in favor of the recommendation by 531 business organizations, while 22 organizations voted against it.

The second proposition was: The committee recommended that a proposal to compel persons controlling the product of mines to sell to all applicants "who may be responsible" is wrong in principle and unworkable in practice.

The replies to that were 527 votes in favor of the chamber's recommendation, and 32 votes opposed to it.

The third was: The committee recommended that there should not be statutory prohibition of conditions accompanying sales and leases to the effect that buyers or lessees can not handle or use the products of competitors.

The replies were 514 votes in favor of the recommendation and 35 votes opposed to it. I want to include in my remarks more of those votes, Mr. President, because they have some application to this matter, but I shall not take the time now to read them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Bulletin No. 110. Series, general. July 15, 1914. Not for publication. Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, Riggs Building, Washington, D. C. This bulletin may be posted in your office or board room and its contents communicated to your members.]

VOTE ON REFERENDUM NO. 8.

Referendum No. 7, the results of which were printed in Bulletin No. 102 of June 5, was taken upon a report of the special committee of the chamber on trust legislation, and dealt with the subject of an interstate trade commission, its jurisdiction, etc. In referendum No. 8 a report of the special committee relative to proposals for legislation regulating business practices was submitted to the organizations which are members of the chamber. Under the by-laws of the chamber the balloting after an interval of 45 days closed at midnight on July 9, when 198 organizations had cast their votes. Details of these votes are printed in the following pages of this bulletin.

In balloting each organization casts as many votes as it may have delegates at an annual meeting of the chamber. The number of delegates an organization may have depends upon the number of its members, but in no case falls below 1 delegate nor exceeds 10.

The separate propositions set out in referendum No. 8, and the totals of the votes, are as follows:

I. The committee recommended that there be no attempt by statute to forbid discriminations in prices of commodities; 531 votes in favor of the recommendation, 22 votes opposed.

II. The committee recommended that a proposal to compel persons controlling the product of mines to sell to all applicants "who may be responsible" is wrong in principle and unworkable in practice; 527 votes in favor of the recommendation, 32 votes opposed.

III. The committee recommended that there should not be statutory prohibition of conditions accompanying sales and leases to the effect that buyers or lessees can not handle or use the products of competitors; 514 votes in favor of the recommendation, 35 votes opposed.

IV. The committee recommended that the final decree in an equity suit brought by the Government which establishes the existence or the nonexistence of a restraint of trade or of a monopoly should be conclusive evidence as to the same general fact in private actions brought against the same defendants under the antitrust laws; 484 votes in favor of the recommendation, 62 votes opposed.

V. The committee recommended that interlocking of directors among competitive business corporations, including railroad corporations, should be prohibited, regardless of the size of corporations, if elimination of competition among the corporations in question would constitute a violation of the Sherman Act; 491 votes in favor of the recommendation, 41 votes opposed.

VI. The committee recommended that interlocking of officers and directors between railroads and industrial businesses with which they transact a substantial volume of business (for example, in the relation of buyer and seller) should be prohibited, except in such instances as the Interstate Commerce Commission may determine are not detrimental to the public interest; 494 votes in favor of the recommendation, 33 votes opposed.

VII. Regarding interlocking of officers and directors between railroads and bankers with whom the railroads have financial transactions, the committee made no recommenation, but suggested three principles, exclusive one of another, on which legislation might proceed. These principles, as embodied in questions, and the votes were as follows:

a. Should interlocking of officers and directors between railroads and bankers with whom they have financial transactions be entirely prohibited? Seventy-seven votes in favor, 133 votes opposed.

b. Should there be legislative prohibition of such interlocking with a provision that a finding of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the effect that in a particular instance there was no detriment to the public interest would prevent illegality in that instance? Sixty-four votes in favor, 95 votes opposed.

c. Should there be legislation in a form which would not pronounce illegal existing situations, but would authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission upon finding a detriment to the public interest in any interlocking to order that it be terminated? Three hundred and twenty-four votes in favor, 42 votes opposed.

VIII. With reference to legislation upon the problems involved in preventing concentration of credit, for example, interlocking of directors among banks, the committee made no recommendation, but stated mutually exclusive methods of procedure, as follows:

a. Should the problems involved in preventing concentration of credit be referred for investigation and recommendation to the Federal Reserve Board or some other competent body? Four hundred and forty-four votes in favor, 43 votes opposed.

b. Should these problems be the subject of immediate legislation; for example, in the form of a prohibition of interlocking of officers or directors among banks, if any bank in question is of a certain size? Thirty-eight votes in favor, 105 votes opposed.

IX. The committee recommended that corporate ownership of stock directly or indirectly of competitor corporations should be prohibited if elimination of competition among the corporations in question would constitute a violation of the Sherman Act, except in such instances as the interstate trade commission (or the Interstate Commerce Commission in the case of railroads) may determine are not detrimental to the public interest; 432 votes in favor of the recommendation, 75 votes opposed.

X. The committee recommended that there should not be an attempt to regulate the shares of stock issued by corporations engaged in interstate commerce; 445 votes in favor of the recommendation, 74 votes opposed.

The attitude of the chamber can be fixed only by two-thirds of the votes cast. Consequently referendum No. 8 has defined the attitude of the chamber on I, II, III, IV, V, VI, VII, VIII, IX, and X.

On VI votes came from 36 States, the District of Columbia, Porto Rico, and the American Chamber of Commerce in Paris, France. On other questions the number of States from which votes came was 35, 34, or 33.

Mr. WEEKS. There has been a very significant statement made this week by a business organization which covers a large section of the eastern part of Pennsylvania, in the Schuylkill Valley, called the Manufacturers' Association of Montgomery County, and I will read some of the conclusions which this association has reached:

The association disclaims all political bias and puts its plea on the grounds that it is necessary "in this most unusual way" to force upon the attention of Washington and of the country an existing industrial condition which is described as "nothing less than frightening."

I should state that this is a letter written to the President which has been given to the press.

Charles F. Williams, president of the association, is also president of James Lees & Sons Co., Bridgeport, whose mill, employing formerly 1,000 persons, is now closed. Mr. Williams has never taken any active part in politics.

The association says:

Of course we are speaking only for the Schuylkill Valley, and more particularly for the Montgomery County Manufacturers' Association, but we are convinced that our case is typical.

It then refers to tariff legislation, and goes on to say:

We have more to say. We need relief from some impending legislation which, according to the public press, you now propose to have enacted before the present Congress adjourns. It is difficult to describe to you the effect which this impending legislation has upon that part of the country which we represent and for which we now speak. No word better describes it than fright. It is right that you should know this. It is right that you should know that men are asking, Is capital to be tabooed? Are successful business men to be declassed as citizens and classified as malefactors? Is the law to say to one class of citizens sabotage is lawful, and to another class property is plunder? The feeling is abroad that malice and class hatred are being toyed with by our Representatives at Washington. Men are frightened as never before in the history of this Nation. They tremble for their country. They fear the cause of the depression is more dangerous than the effect. Men bear to you the tidings, so it is said, that there is no depression; men are not out of work; the country suffers from nothing but "calamity howlers." Our answer is this: In the Schuylkill Valley there is depression; the streets of the Schuylkill Valley towns are lined with men who have no work who one year ago were well employed; the floors of the Schuylkill Valley warehouses are piled with goods for which there is no market and no demand. We speak only for the Schuylkill Valley, but for that we do speak. When any man rises in your presence to tell you, as President of our country, that these men in the Schuylkill Valley can work if they will, that the work is here and that they are crying out merely to discredit your administration, that all this talk about depression is due to an inflamed imagination, then we rise to say that that man, whoever he may be, is guilty of mockery that is exquisitely cruel.

The Merchants' Association of New York is, I believe, the largest business organization in the United States. It conducts its investigations and comes to its conclusions with care. I have had an opportunity to investigate somewhat the methods which are followed by this great association in any public matter which is brought to its attention, and I believe that, to a greater degree than perhaps in almost any other case, their conclusions are a result of most thorough investigation. The men who are best fitted take part in its deliberations and investigations. This association says, referring to this legislation:

We view with profound concern the effort to "rush" legislation of this kind; to enact laws intended vitally to affect the operations of industry and commerce without affording proper opportunity to those who make the laws to understand their influence and effect, and without affording opportunity to the vast number of our citizens whose welfare will be affected, directly or indirectly, by the operation of such laws to understand intelligently what is proposed, to study the probable effects in their infinite ramifications, and to formulate and express their views and wishes.

With even more profound concern we note that these proposed new laws bristle with measures designed to regulate, to control, and to repress the activities of industry and commerce, but embody little or nothing that is constructive or helpful or which indicates even the desire to foster and promote the welfare of American industry and American commerce.

The report goes on to say:

Cooperation has become the greatest and most potent factor in progress, individual and national. It is encouraged by most, if not all, other nations, notably by Germany, whose progress in industry and commerce during the past generation is one of the marvels of our day, and whose system of "kartels," or trade agreements, is not merely permitted by law, but encouraged and fostered by the Government. The proposed laws now pending in Congress all tend in the other direction, to repress or to forbid cooperation in industry and commerce, and to the extent of their influence would handicap us as against the other nations of the world.

The Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, a great combination of chambers of commerce covering all similar organizations in that State, makes these comments:

To shackle the genius of this country, to limit individual freedom and initiative within the confines of parental government direction other than the well-defined limits now understood and recognized as inconsistent with moral law, modern ethics, and the public welfare, would be to set brakes upon the splendid spirit of our people by which all our achievements have been inspired, if not indeed to break down the march of progress, and to force us to the rear in that international contest for the world's business by which alone this country can continue to grow and reach the fruition of which there has heretofore been such ample promise.

Then the report goes on to make another comment, which I think is significant:

With this consciousness abroad in the land your committee believes that what business men generally desire, what industry most needs, is the certainty of a period of rest for the peaceful readjustment of all enterprise that is inconsistent with the accepted principles of law and ethics, and for the energetic advancement of all individual endeavor free of any sense of repression, secure in a sense of liberty of action, and guarded from the danger that the disclosure of personal prerogatives and private achievements would entail.

I have here complete resolutions from various chambers of commerce, one from the Humboldt Chamber of Commerce, of Eureka, Cal., one paragraph of which I wish to put into the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Resolved by the Humboldt Chamber of Commerce, representing the business and commercial interests of the city of Eureka and of the county of Humboldt, State of California, That the Congress of the United States of America is hereby earnestly requested to postpone final action upon the pending antitrust legislation until its next session, and that the intervening time be employed in ascertaining the sense of the people of the whole country toward the various features of the proposed laws, with a view to so perfecting them that a united and deliberate public sentiment shall stand firmly behind these measures if enacted.

Mr. WEEKS. I have another from the Erie (Pa.) Chamber of Commerce, which seems to me particularly appropriate, and which I will read:

Resolved, That we believe that a comprehensive basis for enduring legislation can be obtained only by affording ample time and opportunity to all persons who would be affected in every part of the United States to understand what is proposed in the new bills relating to "a trade commission" and "interlocking directorates" and the "Sherman law definitions bill." This would give the people an opportunity to make suggestions and recommendations to aid Congress in framing legislation which shall promote the vast industrial and commercial interests of the country and at the same time safeguard the rights and interests of all citizens.

I commend this especially to the Senator from Nevada:

We deprecate haste in the enactment of legislation of such importance. Before the judgment of the country has been fully consulted and has come, in Presiden Wilson's words, "to a clear and all but universal agreement," or at least has substantially approved the legislation proposed, and that, in view of the impressive disapproval which has been generally expressed in the hearings thus far had upon these bills before several committees of Congress, and in resolutions adopted by numerous commercial organizations, and in the press throughout the country, regardless of political affiliations, we believe a wiser course will consist in postponing final action until the next session of Congress and in utilizing the interval to ascertain the sense of the country concerning the proposed legislation, which can not fail to have a most profound and far-reaching influence on the conduct of the industry and commerce of the Nation, and therefore on the welfare of the people of the entire country.

From resolutions passed on the 21st of May by the Dallas (Tex.) Chamber of Commerce I wish to read one paragraph:

Now therefore be it resolved by the Chamber of Commerce of Dallas, That we deprecate haste in the enactment of any legislation in such matters. We particularly urge delay in such enactment until the judgment of the business men of the country has been fully consulted and ample opportunity furnished all persons who would be affected to understand what is proposed in the bills relating to a "trade commission" and "interlocking directorates" and the "Sherman law definitions bill." We believe the wise course will consist of postponing final action at least until the next session of Congress. In the meanwhile the opinions of the business men be ascertained, and that such opinions be given due weight in settlement of these questions.

The Boston Chamber of Commerce, which has a membership of more than 3,000, had, I know, a particularly competent committee considering this legislation. The committee reported on the 19th of May, and the action of the committee was unanimously ratified on Tuesday, May 26. Their report is as follows:

1. What the country needs at the present time is a rest from new legislation affecting business and an opportunity to adjust itself to the new conditions created by recent Federal legislation, such as the income tax, the revision of the tariff, and the currency law.
2. There is not sufficient time during the present session of Congress to consider, with the deliberation to which it is entitled, the matter of so-called trust regulation or any general legislation contemplating changes in or additions to the present restrictions on interstate or foreign trade
3. Accordingly the board of directors is opposed to the consideration or enactment of any form of such legislation during the present session of Congress.
4. The whole subject of such legislation should be postponed until the next session of Congress, and in the meanwhile Congress, by its committee, should take the opportunity to invite the cooperation of business men throughout the country in framing needful legislation.

The National Association of Manufacturers have passed on this question in similar manner. I will ask consent to print, without reading, one paragraph from their resolutions, which is particularly pertinent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Therefore be it resolved, That the National Association of Manufacturers, a nonpolitical, nonpartisan organization, representing all crafts and groups of industry, do hereby solemnly protest against continuous assault on our established industries. That we affirm our conviction that unless there is a cessation of hostility to legitimate business the vitality of our commerce and trade will be critically impaired; And we therefore finally

Resolved, That we unqualifiedly oppose the passage of the Clayton bill (H. R. 15657) now pending before Congress.

Mr. WEEKS. I also desire to read from resolutions passed by the annual convention of the National Jewelers' Board of Trade of the United States held at the Hotel Astor. This is a large and very representative body of men. They say:

Be it further resolved, That in the event that further legislation is imperative, such legislation should receive the closest scrutiny, and merchants should be given every opportunity to be heard by Congress after they have learned the exact scope and power of the proposed laws.

Be it further resolved, That it is generally not feasible for merchants to go to Washington to appear before the committee having these bills in charge, and we respectfully suggest that the far-reaching effects of these proposed laws would justify hearings in different commercial centers of the country, to the end that all merchants may have equal opportunity to speak on matters which so closely concern them.

The Philadelphia Board of Trade, one of the largest in the United States, has passed on this subject with great clearness and force. I will ask to include a part of its conclusions in my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PRICE DISCRIMINATION.

In section 2 of the act it is declared to be a crime to discriminate in price between purchasers of commodities with the purpose or intent to injure the business of a competitor.

With the general moral purpose ascertainable in this provision no one would disagree. There is such a thing as an effort to wantonly destroy the business of a competitor by means other than those recognized as fair competition. The act, however, as drawn is, we believe, unsound and likely to do substantial harm.

Discriminations in price are essential to any freedom in trade. The manufacturer or dealer in goods who has a large supply in the West with a small demand must be at liberty to sell in the West at a lower price than he would in the East if he had there a small supply and an active demand. He must sell at an advancing or declining scale of prices and on such market as may exist in different localities. Discrimination in price per se is a part of the life of trade and contains no element of immorality.

Moreover, discrimination in price is an essential to competition. Competition means obtaining business formerly done by others, and this is accomplished by price cutting in the market where the competitor is operating. It would be mere hypocrisy to pretend that competition does not injure or destroy the business of the competitor. The avowed purpose of the competition is to take the competitor's business from him as he is attempting to take your business from you. Competition is the settled policy of the law, and it would be manifest folly to pass an act requiring that the effects of competition must not exist. The direct effect of competition is "to injure or destroy."

It follows, therefore, that every person in a competitive business who cuts prices in order to obtain the business formerly held by some other competitor would come within the terms of the proposed act, since the direct effect of his price cutting is to injure the business of his opponent, and he is presumed to know the effect of his acts. The act as drawn should not, therefore, be passed. It would place everyone doing business in the United States in jeopardy of fine and imprisonment.

Mr. WEEKS. I have here a clipping from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat which contains an appeal from the Business Men's League of St. Louis. I wish it to be particularly noticed that these expressions of opinion do not come from any one class of cities or from any one particular section of the country, but they come from every section; and they are evidently not inspired from one source, but are prepared as the deliberate judgment of the business men who have subscribed to them. The Business Men's League of St. Louis makes this statement:

Whereas in our opinion these bills, drastic in their terms, are not thoroughly understood at this time by the business men of the city of St. Louis, and that further time for their consideration both by the public and by our legislators is necessary; and

Whereas said bills propose to give to a commission an enormous power and control over practically all kinds of business in the United States, neither the scope nor effect of which can at this time be foreseen; be it

Resolved, That the Business Men's League of St. Louis believes that the passage of any further amount of new legislation at this session of Congress which has for its purpose the regulation or control of business along new and untried lines is inopportune and might jeopardize the general welfare of this country, and we believe that the passage of such legislation at this time would rather tend to further stagnate business than to stimulate it; be it further

Resolved, That the president be hereby directed to forward to our Congressmen and to our Senators a copy of this resolution.

Those were resolutions passed on the 27th day of June. I will add that all of these resolutions have been passed by business men without regard to political affiliations. I assume that business men's organizations in the South, whose resolutions I have read, such as the one from Dallas, Tex., are largely made up of men belonging to the dominant party; I do not see that any reflection on the President or on the dominant party appears in any form in these resolutions; but they are an expression of business views without any regard to political considerations.

The Rochester Chamber of Commerce, of Rochester, N. Y., has given expression to its sentiments in a resolution which I think should be included in the RECORD, and I ask that I may do so, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution referred to is as follows:

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of Rochester, N. Y., respectfully urges upon the committees of Congress having these matters under consideration such reasonable delay in their final report as may permit the presentation and consideration of such recommendations as may be found to be concurred in by the business interests of the country so collected and represented by referendum vote, it being their conviction that no condition of business exists which calls for either hasty or radical legislation.

Mr. WEEKS. The Youngstown Chamber of Commerce, of Youngstown, Ohio, has adopted a similar resolution, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Resolved, That we believe that a comprehensive basis for enduring legislation can be obtained only by affording ample time and opportunity to all persons who would be affected in every part of the United States to understand what is proposed in the new bills relating to "a trades commission" and "interlocking directorates" and the "Sherman law definitions bill." This would give the people an opportunity to make suggestions and recommendations to aid Congress in framing legislation which shall promote the vast industrial and commercial interests of the country and at the same time safeguard the rights and interests of all citizens. We deprecate haste in the enactment of legislation of such importance. Before the judgment of the country has been fully consulted and has come, in President Wilson's words, "to a clear and all but universal agreement," or at least has substantially approved the legislation proposed, and that, in view of the impressive disapproval which has been generally expressed in the hearings thus far had upon these bills before several committees of Congress and in resolutions adopted by numerous commercial organizations and in the press throughout the country, regardless of political affiliations, we believe a wiser course will consist in postponing final action until the next session of Congress and in utilizing the interval to ascertain the sense of the country concerning the proposed legislation, which can not fail to have a most profound and far-reaching influence on the conduct of the industry and commerce of the Nation and therefore on the welfare of the people of the entire country.

Mr. WEEKS. I have in my hand expressions of opposition to different phases of this legislation coming from business organizations throughout the United States. They are very brief, and relate to various details of the legislation and express their disapproval. They are so pointed and so brief that I will ask that all of them may be inserted in the RECORD without being read. There are nearly 100 of them, which cover some six or seven pages of this paper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The Herald telegraphed to officers of 70 chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and similar organizations the following:

"Please wire 100 words your views on plan of trust legislation as presented to President Wilson this week by representatives of the Chicago Association of Commerce. If official expression of your organization is not obtainable, kindly indicate consensus of opinion of your representative business men as known to you or some other prominent individual."

PRINCIPAL POINTS IN PLAN.

These are the principal points in the Chicago Association of Commerce plan as urged upon President Wilson:

"The Clayton antitrust bill is unnecessary if the trade commission measure is altered to conform to business ideas.

"Further definitive legislation is unnecessary. It will disturb business through the uncertainty of court rulings which will not be obtainable until after months of suspense."

EXERCISE OF JURISDICTION.

"Jurisdiction should be exercised by the trade commission over corporations or anyone who is subject to the Sherman antitrust law. It should have the authority to rule certain practices fair and not in violation of the Sherman law, subject to the authority of the Attorney General of the United States.

"Insistence on annual reports from corporations is not businesslike or economical; neither is the regulation of account and record systems.

"Sufficient knowledge of violations of the law may be obtained if aggrieved persons have the right to file complaints on which investigation must be made by the commission."

VIEWS OF OTHERS.

While many favored that code of principles, others from which answers were received indicated more satisfaction in the proposals of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, which are, in substance:

"Create an interstate trade commission of five members appointed by the President. Give the commission administrative powers over trade and business matters similar to those exercised by the railroad commission and consolidate with it the Bureau of Corporations.

"Abandon the Clayton bill, or at least that part of it which would exempt labor and agricultural organizations from the operation of the bill and which would limit or restrict the right of injunction in connection with labor matters."

GREAT VARIETY OF OPINIONS.

Summary of resolutions accompanying vote on referendum of Chamber of Commerce of the United States upon legislation for creation of interstate-trade commission.

(Quoted from Bulletin No. 102, June 5, 1914, announcing the vote.)

(a) The San Francisco Chamber of Commerce approved a recommendation of the Chicago Association of Commerce that the Attorney General should begin suit under antitrust laws only upon request of the interstate-trade commission after it has made investigation.

(b) The Denver Chamber of Commerce voted in favor of recommendation 4 only if modified to prevent the commission from requiring annual reports from such classes of corporations as it might determine if these corporations have capital resources of less than $5,000,000 or income less than $2,500,000. In voting on recommendation 7 the Denver chamber expressed an opinion that the Sherman Act should not be changed in any particular.

(c) The New Haven Chamber of Commerce adopted a resolution "that in view of present industrial conditions it is not wise to supplement existing legislation of this character."

(d) The Washington Board of Trade in declining to vote on recommendation 3 adopted resolutions to the effect that before beginning any suit under the antitrust laws the Attorney General should submit the facts to the interstate-trade commission and obtain its approval for the initiation of proceedings.

(e) The Alton Board of Trade qualified its vote on recommendation 1 by favoring on the commission two members of high standing in commercial life, two members of high standing in financial life, and one lawyer of broad experience in corporation affairs; on recommendation 2 by favoring extension of jurisdiction of the commission to partnerships and individuals; and on recommendation 6 by opposing publicity of findings in individual cases.

(f) The American Manufacturers' Association of Products from Corn in casting their ballot opposed any further legislation.

(g) The Chicago Association of Commerce in voting in opposition to recommendation 2 explained that in its opinion jurisdiction should extend to persons as well as corporations, thus being coextensive with the Sherman Act. In voting in opposition to recommendation 4 it stated that annual reports are not an efficient means of obtaining information and should not be required of any corporations. Independently of the referendum the association of commerce adopted a draft of a bill which has been sent by the association of commerce to all Members of this Chamber.

(h) The Freeport Chamber of Commerce in voting in favor of recommendation 7 opposed any radical change in the Sherman Act as is applies to domestic trade.

(i) The Rockford Chamber of Commerce in connection with its vote on recommendation 7 stated it favors "further regulated cooperation in domestic trade for the purpose of reducing the cost of distribution."

(j) The Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce cast no definite vote on recommendation 1, but stated that if Congress decides at once to enact a law it prefers the Covington bill with section 9 modified by elimination of power in the commission to bring new classes of corporations within the requirement of annual reports; and Indianapolis chamber believes the powers of the commission should be definitely fixed.

(k) The Indianapolis Board of Trade, in voting against the recommendations of the committee, stated that in its opinion full and timely investigation and submission of the questions to the business interests of the country should precede any legislation for an interstate trade commission, and that "business interests are suffering more at this time by threatened legislation than by a need of further legislation."

(l) The New Orleans Association of Commerce, referring to recommendation 1, recommended that in the interest of accuracy of designation the title of the Interstate Commerce Commission should be changed to Interstate Traffic Commission, since "commerce" is so generic a term as to include both traffic and trade. In connection with recommendation 3 the New Orleans association recommended that the commission have power to give advice upon condition that the applicant for advice, in order to prevent frivolous applications, bear part or all of the expense of investigation; also that if the commission reached a finding of fact favorable to applicant, the legal questions should be placed before the Attorney General, and the applicant advised if his opinion were favorable, and that if the findings of the commission or the rulings of the Attorney General were later reversed, the cost of any subsequent contest in the courts should be borne by the United States and criminal penalties should not be imposed. If the findings of the commission or the rulings of the Attorney General were unfavorable, the New Orleans association would have the applicant notified, and would provide that in case he nevertheless proceeded and was subsequently involved in litigation he should bear the costs and other burdens.

(n) The Massachusetts State Board of Trade qualified its vote on recommendation 1 to the effect that the majority of the members of the commission should be business men.

(o) The New England Shoe and Leather Association passed a resolution expressing approval of an interstate trade commission, but opposing the pending bill because there has not been adequate study, and because before such a bill is enacted the general business interests of the country should be invited to express their opinions.

(p) The National Machine Tool Builders' Association submitted a resolution in which, because of opposition to the bill for a trade commission stated it meant to refrain from voting except to the extent of protesting against enactment of the pending bill.

(q) The Bayonne Chamber of Commerce in voting against all the recommendations stated that in its opinion the pending bill is needlessly inquisitorial, permitting the Government to delve into lawful business methods and practices of private concerns and publish them to the world, thus making disclosures to competitors.

(r) The Passaic Board of Trade wishes at least as many members on the interstate trade commission as there are on the Interstate Commerce Commission—seven.

(s) The Manufacturers and Business Men's Association of New York, in transmitting its ballot, stated that it believed the pending bill should be withdrawn as the prospect of antitrust legislation will cause a continuance of poor business conditions, and there should be an opportunity for recovery from disturbed conditions, which have followed enactment of the new tariff, the income tax, and the currency law, and the Mexican situation.

(t) The Buffalo Chamber of Commerce in casting its ballot filed resolutions to the effect that existing law, properly and efficiently administered, is adequate for the proper regulation of business.

(u) The Merchants' Association of New York, as part of its vote, filed a statement that although not opposed to the principle of a trade commission it deplores the effort to "rush" legislation of this kind which involves a new and untried experiment; that if, after sufficient time had been given to discussion and deliberation, a trade commission were created it should not have principally regulatory and repressive functions, but should be designed primarily to promote and foster legitimate business of every kind, and especially to assist American industry and commerce when in competition with industries of other nations in the neutral markets of the world.

(v) The National Paint, Oil, ad Varnish Association adopted resolution asking that "congressional action upon an interstate trade commission be deferred until such time as a clearer understanding exists with regard to the causes and effects upon and in the commercial and industrial welfare of our country."

(w) The National Wholesale Lumber Dealers' Association opposed legislation at this session of Congress, for the reason that industries should first have opportunity to adjust their affairs to the new tariff and currency legislation, and registered its votes only in the event a bill for a trade commission is at once to be enacted.

(x) The Natural Ice Association of America opposed recommendation V, but also opposed "any requirement for the reporting of names of customers."

(y) The Winston-Salem Board of Trade, in voting on recommendation III, recommended that orders and consents of the commission be prima facie evidence of lawfulness until changed by the commission or reversed by the courts.

(z) The Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce and Merchants' Exchange favors extending the jurisdiction of the commission expressly to individuals and partnerships.

(aa) The Hamilton Chamber of Commerce (Ohio), with reference to recommendations IV and V, passed a resolution to the effect that reports and information should be required only from corporations against which there is suspicion of violation of law or charges have been filed.

(bb) The Tile Manufacturers' Credit Association believes the commission should have powers to permit business to expand through cooperative efforts, to the profit of all without injury to the consumer, and, with reference to recommendation VII, it does not see a reason why a special study should be made of foreign trade rather than of domestic trade.

(cc) The Erie Chamber of Commerce passed a resolution recommending that Congress defer further action on legislation relating to business and manufacturing interests. The favorable votes of the Erie Chamber are conditioned on the creation of a commission, to which it is opposed

(dd) The Philadelphia Board of Trade adopted a memorial opposing the creation of a trade commission on the ground that a body which would generally oversee the details of business life has no place in the machinery of our Government, and asserting that practices opposed by sound moral judgment of the community, such as rebates, attempts to acquire absolute control of particular industries, etc., have been the subject of adequate legislative prohibition, and that the existing machinery for enforcing the law, when once put in motion, is efficient. The board of trade indicated its opinion that supervision of public-service corporations by commissions is as yet experimental, and that the commissions have not demonstrated their right to a permanent place among our institutions.

(ee) The American Face Brick Association, Pittsburgh, opposes further antitrust legislation until a time when "both Congress and the business people understand more fully the objects and effects such legislation would have on business in general."

(ff) The American Warehousemen's Association made its votes apply only to H. R. 14531 (the Covington bill), requiring that if this bill is superseded by another measure the vote of the association is to be recorded as against any legislation at this session of Congress.

(gg) The Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce wishes legislation concerning a trade commission postponed until another session of Congress, believing that legislation concerning the tariff and concerning banking and currency has given business men many problems of readjustment which should be solved before a study of additional legislation affecting business is begun. If a bill is to be passed, however, the Pittsburgh Chamber records its votes as indicated above in connection with recommendation I, urging that the members of the commission have active, practical business knowledge and experience, and in connection with recommendation IV voting upon condition that an annual income of $2,500,000 should not be used as a test for corporations which are to make annual reports.

(hh) The Reading (Pa.) Chamber of Commerce would not favor a trade commission with powers exceeding those outlined in the Covington bill, and believes that "any person" disclosing information obtained by the commission should be punished. In Recommendation IV the Reading Chamber would not use an income of $2,500,000 as a test.

(ii) The Seattle Chamber of Commerce believes that legislation in this session of Congress should be confined to enactment of a bill for a trade commission.

(jj) The Merchants and Manufacturers' Association, Milwaukee, with regard to Recommendation IV, would require annual reports from all corporations having capital reources of $500,000.

(kk) The Wisconsin Manufacturers' Association, with regard to Recommendation IV, would require annual reports from all corporations having capital resources of $500,000.

(ll) The American Chamber of Commerce, in Paris, believes that the law should expressly require a majority of the commission to be business men of recognized experience, reputation, and authority.

ORGANIZATIONS NOT FILING BALLOTS, BUT REGISTERING OPINIONS.

The Clinton (Iowa) Commercial Club did not vote, but adopted resolutions to the effect that legislation should be postponed until the next session of Congress, in order that there may be opportunity for study.

The Louisville Board of Trade declined to vote, and stated that it has no faith in the conduct of commercial and business affairs by commission government, and that the Sherman Act is practically a sufficient guide to business interests.

The Framingham (Mass.) Board of Trade did not vote, but unanimously opposed the pending bill, declaring that there has not been sufficient time for study and that there should be a cessation of legislation affecting business.

The Grand Rapids Association of Commerce cast no vote, but adopted resolutions recommending that no action be taken by Congress on pending legislation, but that the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America should appoint a commission of business inquiry and constructive legislation for the purpose of considering all legislative proposals with respect to interstate business, with a view to formulating the business sentiment of the country.

The National Automobile Chamber of Commerce did not vote, but adopted resolutions opposing an interstate trade commission as now proposed, because it fails to afford something more than a menace to legal process.

The Rochester Chamber of Commerce refrained from voting and adopted resolutions opposing the trade commission bill as unnecessary, harassing, and harmful to legitimate business.

The Watertown Chamber of Commerce, New York, did not vote, but protested against the passage of the pending bill.

The Cleveland Chamber of Commerce did not vote, but opposed the passage of any bill at this session of Congress, for the reason that the country has not had time for mature deliberation necessary to frame a measure which will constructively advance business interests both in domestic and foreign trade and yet provide for proper regulation.

The Providence Chamber of Commerce, Rhode Island, did not vote, but adopted resolutions protesting against the enactment of the pending bill until there has been ample time for consideration and discussion of the new proposals by all the people of the country, with a provision for obtaining testimony from business men and business organizations whose activities prevent their appearing at Washington to express their views. The Providence chamber wishes legislation postponed until a later session of Congress.

Mr. WEEKS. In editorials and otherwise attempts are made to compare the determining of unfair competition, as proposed in the trade commission bill, with fair and reasonable railroad rates approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is undoubtedly true that there may be some basis for a comparison; but the question of making fair and reasonable railroad rates reduces itself to an examination of the requirements and the determination of a rate for a railroad which serves a very large territory, and which is final in that section until conditions change. That is a simple proposition, because it relates to a single affirmative action; but it is entirely different from unfair competition, which must be determined as a result of an investigation undertaken in the case of every corporation engaged in active trade.

If one decision relating to unfair competition could apply to all business concerns in the same trade, the difficulty would not be great; but everyone who has been in any way connected with active business must know that the methods employed in getting business are multitudinous, and that a settlement of the question of what is unfair competition in the case of one corporation would not apply to the settlement of complaints against other corporations in the same or similar trade. In other words, one firm in the city of Washington might be proceeded against 100 times for unfair competition, and yet none of these decisions could be used as a precedent in a complaint against an adjoining business in the same trade So that in determining a question of competition for a whole section by one decision, as would be done in the case of rates, the one decision would be applicable only to the individual case involved, and would not in any way point out to the business concerns involved or to others engaged in active business what they might do in other instances or what might be done in some other section of the country by a concern engaged in the same business.

That being the case, it is easily seen that there must be involved enormous expenditures in order to carry out the purposes of this commission. I want to submit some views on the subject of the cost of the commission. Of course, they are not final in any respect. They are based on supposition, but they may hold out to the minds of Senators some indication of what we are going to involve ourselves in if we try to regulate all of the 305,000 corporations in this country which would come under the terms of the pending legislation.

The only practical comparison that we can make is with the cost of maintaining the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is doing a similar work. This cost in the year ending June 30, 1913, according to the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, page 87, was $1,853,259.03. The total number of companies which reported to the Interstate Commerce Commission in the year 1913 was somewhat less than 2,200. The average expense of the Interstate Commerce Commission, therefore, for supervising each corporation, not including any of the expense of physical valuation, to which I shall refer later on, amounted to over $8.423, as appears in the annual report of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The total number of corporations in the United States in the year 1913 was 305,336. I get those figures from the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, pages 101 and 102. This included 141,889 corporations classified as commercial and financial corporations, steamboat, ferryboat, and stage lines, pipe lines, gas, electric light, transportation, storage, telegraph, telephone, and miscellaneous companies. Doubtless these 141,889 corporations included many that do an interstate business or that, for one reason or another, would come under a Federal trade commission. Assuming, however, that none of them do, and that the only corporations coming under the Federal trade commission would be the 163,447 industrial and mercantile corporations remaining after making this arbitrary and excessive deduction, and assuming that the Federal trade commission would work as economically as the Interstate Commerce Commission, the annual cost of the proposed Federal trade commission would be the enormous total of $1,376,714,081.

Mr. THOMAS. For one year?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WEEKS. In one moment. I want to explain to the Senator from Colorado that if as much money were expended in supervising each of the corporations that would come under the provisions of this act as was spent by the Interstate Commerce Commission last year in supervising the corporations that that commission supervised, amounting to something like $8,400 for each corporation, it would cost for one year the enormous figure which I have just read.

I now yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there is a difference between the present bill and the interstate-commerce act in a respect just noted by the Senator from Massachusetts which he possibly may have overlooked. The law requires all the corporations which are within the interstate-commerce act—namely, common carriers—to make reports. This proposed law does not require all corporations engaged in commerce, other than common carriers, to make reports.

Mr. WEEKS. May I interrupt the Senator? There is nothing to prevent the commission calling on all these corporations for reports.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is nothing.

Mr. WEEKS. Not only annual reports, but reports at any time the commission sees fit.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is nothing; but it is unfair, I think, to presume that the trade commission will call upon the great mass of the corporations throughout the country to make these reports. It was found impossible to limit the jurisdiction of the commission unless it were limited by the amount of capital which might be employed by the several corporations or by the amount of business which they might do; and therefore the jurisdiction was made general. I venture to say, however, that the trade commission would not find it necessary or helpful to call for reports from all these corporations, any more than the Bureau of Corporations has found it necessary to require all such reports or to investigate all corporations that might be engaged in commerce. I think we ought to assume that the trade commission is to be composed of practical, sane men, and that it would call for reports only from those corporations concerning which it had some reason to believe that the information they furnished would be of value in the performance of its duties.

I must think, therefore, that the apprehensions of the Senator from Massachusetts with regard to the vast cost of maintaining the commission will not be realized.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I have no idea that anyone would countenance any such enormous expense as I have suggested might be possible under the provisions of this bill; and I agree with the Senator from Iowa that undoubtedly the reports called for and the action taken by the commission will be very much less than the maximum which would entail any such expense as this. I am submitting these figures, however, because I want to show the possibilities of expense; and I am going, directly, to point out the way we are drifting in this country into not only enormous expenditures for governmental purposes, but the employment of great numbers of men, so that, if we do not have a care, one of these days we are going to have every citizen who is trying to earn a living carrying a Government employee on his back.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa has made a very long and exhaustive study of this subject, and I should like to ask him if he finds that a trade commission of this character has been established in any other country?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think not just such a trade commission as this. Of course, the Senator from Rhode Island knows that England has a council which probably has wider jurisdiction over its industries than it is proposed to give to this commission over ours.

Mr. COLT. While the whole subject of a trade commission is of a novel character, I must confess that I can not quite see the parallel which has been referred to by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] between the Interstate Commerce Commission and this proposed trade commission. It seems to me that they are entirely dissimilar, for this reason:

The Interstate Commerce Commission is founded upon the law which governs highways. The public have always had an interest in highways at common law, and with respect to such highways it has always been the rule that the public should be treated with absolute equality, and that if tolls are charged they should be reasonable. Fundamentally, the Interstate Commerce Commission is merely engaged in regulating public or quasi-public corporations which relate to public highways in the broadest sense. In the regulation of these corporations we find two clearly defined purposes, namely, equality of treatment and reasonable rates. Further, if it should be necessary for the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate the issuing of securities upon the theory that the issuing of those securities had been abused, and had therefore led to unreasonable rates, this would be fairly within the legitimate powers of governmental regulation.

But a commission to regulate trade concerns an entirely different subject matter. There is no such rule of equality here. Trade, as we all know, is made up of an infinite variety of details and practices which are beyond the power of comprehension. There is no man living who can draw a statute regulating the details of trade.

Therefore I can not see the parallel between the Interstate Commerce Commission regulating railroad corporations and a trade commission regulating the vast business concerns of the country.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Rhode Island that the parallel between the Interstate Commerce Commission and the trade commission is not close. I agree that the regulation which we have given to the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce is not the same kind of regulation that we propose to confer upon the trade commission. The Senator from Rhode Island must remember, however, that we have given to the Interstate Commerce Commission many powers and the enforcement of many provisions of law which have no direct connection with either the rates that are to be charged by common carriers or the equality which they must observe as between their patrons.

I shall not enumerate these various provisions. They are well known to the Senator from Rhode Island. The fact, however, that I do not find so close a parallel between the Interstate Commerce Commission and the proposed trade commission as my friend from Nevada finds does not in any wise affect my conclusions in regard to the wisdom of establishing the trade commission.

We ought to keep our minds firmly, as it seems to me, on just one proposition. We propose to regulate the private commerce of the country as distinguished from the public commerce. I shall not undertake at this moment to enter upon the inquiry as to what regulation is wise; but, assuming that we are ready to prescribe some further regulation of commerce, we are next met with the duty of enforcing that regulation; and the enforcement of the regulation ought to be entirely disassociated in our minds, as it seems to me, from the regulation itself, in order that we may view both with impartiality and clearness.

For instance, we prescribe certain things with regard to our postal department. We enumerate certain things that may be transported from place to place in the mails. Those provisions would be of no value if we did not give to somebody the authority to enforce them; and so we give that authority in some measure to the Postmaster General. The authority we give to the Postmaster General with regard to the mails is, I think, vastly greater than that which we propose here to give to the commission for the enforcement of whatever regulation we may impose upon commerce.

Mr. COLT. But, Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. Again, we pass a law that prescribes the conditions upon which immigrants shall be received into the United States. Those provisions are uncertain; they are vague; they are susceptible of application in different ways by different men. But we must have somebody to enforce them; therefore we give the enforcement of the law to the Commissioner of Immigration in the first instance, and after him to the Secretary of the Department of Labor.

Just so here. I am assuming now—I do not intend to argue it at this time—that the phrase "unfair competition" is sufficiently certain to become a part of the law of the land. Somebody must apply that phrase to actual affairs. Somebody must attempt to see that the will of Congress is carried into execution. All that the commission is established for, in so far as that section is concerned, is simply to enforce that law in the same general way that every other administrative officer we create is directed to carry the law into effect.

There is, in my opinion, this important difference between the trade commission that we are here establishing and the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission, in fixing rates, is a supplement to the Congress, because it is a legislative function to fix rates for public transportation, and therefore the Interstate Commerce Commission is a legislative-administrative tribunal combined. The trade commission that we here propose to establish is purely an executive or administrative tribunal. It exercises no legislative functions whatever. I have looked upon it simply as an arm of the Government to help carry into effect the rule which we announce as the one that ought to control and govern the industry of the country.

Mr. COLT. Let me ask the Senator if he has thought of the matter in this light: When you are speaking of the Interstate Commerce Commission or the regulations of the Post Office Department, you are dealing with questions of public law. When you come to the trade commission, you are dealing strictly with questions of private law, questions of the right of contract, of property rights; questions which, under our system of law, never have been, except in the broadest sense, subject to governmental regulation. Under our system of laws the right of contract and the right to acquire property are matters of private law which have always been left to the individual with little or no governmental regulation.

I am not objecting to the constitutional phase of this bill, because I know that statutes are not held unconstitutional unless that fact clearly appears; but I am objecting to the policy of the Government which is embodied in this bill because it is a new departure, because it is something unknown in the history of the Anglo-Saxon people, unless you go back to Queen Elizabeth's time and to the statute of laborers and the sumptuary laws of that period. Under this proposed law the Government of the United States is entering the domain of private law and is creating a commission to regulate business in all its details. While I know that great changes have taken place in the methods of trade and commerce and that these changes have been accompanied by certain evil practices, it is also true that we have now on the statute books a great law for the correction of these evils, and under these conditions I can see no necessity for this bill.

It amazes me to think that the Federal Government is proposing to establish a commission with powers to invade the rights of private property and of contract and to regulate them in all their details.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator from Rhode Island will give to this subject, as to every other, careful and impartial study. There is a sense in which it is a new departure. Our constitutional authority is complete. When our forefathers said that "Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce among the States," they subjected the interchange of commodities between the people of the States to exactly the same rules, as far as authority is concerned, that they imposed upon the actual movement of these commodities through the instrumentality of a common carrier.

As the world has gone on it has become increasingly apparent that organized society must do something to protect itself against moral wrongs or, if not moral wrongs, to protect itself against the effects of selfishness if left undisturbed and unrestrained. Therefore we have proceeded, under our authority to regulate commerce among the States, to enact a pure-food law—an enactment which 50 years ago would have shocked every citizen of the Republic. If it had been suggested 50 years ago that the United States should endeavor to determine how all our food should be marked, what the labels should contain, what safeguards should be thrown around these articles in order to protect the public, I fancy the suggestion would have met the same fear and apprehension that many people now honestly feel when we propose to take this further step. I might instance a great many other powers which the Government has found it necessary to exercise which formerly, by common consent, were left in abeyance.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not wish to cut off the Senator from Iowa, but I want to call his attention to the fact that when the pure-food act was passed conditions had been reached which were ideal to result in legislation, because there was a unanimous sentiment that the time had come when such legislation should be passed. There was no division of sentiment as there is over this question. It had been discussed in Congress for many years in one form or another, and when the act which is now in the statute books was passed it was the unanimous action of Congress and it had public sentiment unanimously behind it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was not in Congress when it was passed, but I have been a member of the Committee on Manufactures since I entered the Senate, and there have been many proposals there for the modification or enlargement of provisions of the pure-food law that have not met with universal approval. I think there is the same difference of opinion about that subject that there is about this.

The Senator from Massachusetts is quite right in one respect and altogether wrong in another. I think he is right in saying that the people of this country have not crystallized their opinions with regard to the remedy, with regard to just the thing that should be done, the law that should be passed. But they have long ago reached a conclusion—and I think it is practically a unanimous opinion—that we must do something to preserve free, fair competition in the business life of the United States; that we must do something to preserve the independence of the man as distinguished from the power of the corporation; that we must do something to perpetuate the individual initiative.

We often go wrong, I believe, in assuming that beeause a great corporation, a vast aggregation of wealth, can produce a given commodity more cheaply than can a smaller concern, therefore it is for the welfare and the interest of the people of the country that the commodity shall be produced at the lower cost. I do not accept that article of economic faith. I think we can purchase cheapness at altogether too high a price, if it involves the surrender of the individual, the subjugation of a great mass of people to a single master mind. I think in that respect there is no difference in the sentiment of the intelligent thinking men and women of the United States, and we are warranted by that sentiment in attempting to accomplish more than has been accomplished in this direction. Whether the particular measures that are before the Senate at this time are a fair expression of public opinion I do not pretend to say. I do not agree with the Senator altogether in that respect; but it may be that further reflection, further study, further investigation by the great mass of the people, would be productive of good results. I am not arguing that proposition.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I wish to continue the discussion in which I was engaged relating to the cost, or the possible cost, of carrying on the activities connected with this commission. I have shown that if the same expense were incurred in the 163,447 corporations which may come under the jurisdiction of the commission, which certainly come under its jurisdiction, at the same individual cost that is incurred by the Interstate Commerce Commission, it would cost $1,376,714 a year. Obviously it is impossible to conceive that Congress would make an appropriation of any such amount even if it were desirable that it be expended; and it can not be assumed either that this trade commission is going to perform all its functions immediately as cheaply as does the Interstate Commerce Commission. But there are vast differences in the activities in which this commission will be called upon to engage.

The Federal trade commission would have to supervise corporations engaged in every line of business; mining, lumber, and coke companies; rolling mills; foundry and machine shops; sawmills, flour, woolen, cotton, and other mills; manufacturers of cars, automobiles, elevators, agricultural implements, and all articles manufactured from metal, wood, and other material; manufacturers and refiners of sugar, molasses, sirup, and other products; ice and refrigerating companies; slaughterhouses; tannery, packing, and canning companies; dealers in coal, lumber, grain, produce, and all kinds of goods, wares, and merchandise; and in general every kind of financial, commercial, industrial, manufacturing, and mercantile corporation engaging in any business whatsoever across State lines.

I could go on indefinitely by instancing the kind of industries with which this commission will have to engage its activites.

It would include every conceivable kind of property, tangible and intangible. Only a small fraction of it would relate to any single industry; little of it would be homogeneous in character; by far the greater part of it would lie outside the experience of the most widely experienced appraiser.

If seven men, composing the Interstate Commerce Commission, with all the clerical, engineering, and legal assistance at their disposal, have to spend annually $1,853,269.03 in order to supervise 2,200 corporations that conduct a single industry and own comparatively homogeneous property, how much time and money would five men composing the Federal trade commission have to spend in order to supervise 163,447 corporations of miscellaneous and heterogeneous character relating to every kind of business under the sun?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts, does he understand the bill to be confined in its operations entirely to corporations?

Mr. WEEKS. That is my understanding.

Mr. SHIELDS. I call his attention to the definition of corporations, on page 13, as used in the bill:

The term "corporation" or "corporations" shall include joint-stock associations and all other associations having shares of capital or capital stock organized to carry on business for profit.

It is not uncommon for partnerships to divide their capital into so many shares. A corporation, from the time where the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, I may say, in English law is well known. It is an artificial person created with franchises by the grant of the governing power of the country. It is a term as well known and defined as is possible in the common law of the country. A mere corporation would mean an artificial person with power and franchises granted by the government of its domicile. Under this language all joint-stock associations and all organizations in partnership formed to carry on business for profit would be covered, and instead of 163,000 the number would be half a million partnerships and corporations under the dominion of these five men.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLIS. If I may explain that, it has grown to be the custom in New England, particularly for manufacturing corporations, to turn their property over to trustees, to be managed as joint-stock associations. They are not in form corporations, but they carry on their work just as if they were. The great express companies are joint-stock associations, and while they would not come under this act, there are many manufacturing concerns, formerly corporations, that would. I think that was the reason for including joint-stock associations.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield further to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. Doubtless that is the reason, but it will not change the fact. Under this language the courts can not but construe it to apply to partnerships, and thus there will be no limit to the business interests of the country which will be subjected to the inquisition of this law and the embarrassment that is required in making reports of their business at any time, and certainly annually, by the provisions of the bill.

Mr. WEEKS. The suggestion made by the Senator from Tennessee would simply aggravate the conditions which I have tried to outline. I am limiting my discussion to joint-stock corporations.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee whether he would regard every partnership as a joint-stock association?

Mr. SHIELDS. Practically I would, under the definition given here, because when you leave a corporation and its well-known definition there is no limit. They are all left in uncertainty to the construction of the various courts that may be called upon to adjudicate the question.

Mr. HOLLIS. But I think the Senator from Tennessee must realize that there are very few partnerships having shares of capital or capital stock. They are almost unknown. It is only when they have shares of capital stock that they become joint-stock associations, and would come under the bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. On the contrary, I never knew a partnership that did not have capital. Whether it was paid in the form of shares of stock or not it would not do business long without capital.

Mr. HOLLIS. But this does not say "capital"; it says "associations having shares of capital or capital stock." That is the exact definition.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I was about to add that the administration tells us that the Interstate Commerce Commission does not now adequately supervise the 2,200 corporations under its jurisdiction, and that the Interstate Commerce Commission ought to have greater powers and duties, calling, of course, for greater expense, in order adequately to do its work. So that the enormous annual expense of $1,376,714,081 would actually be inadequate for really efficient supervision.

No commission, of course, will ever be given this stupendous annual appropriation. From the experience of the Interstate Commerce Commission, however, it is plain that a Federal trade commission, with much less than this stupendous sum, can not really be effective. Presumably, the administration wants none but an effective commission. For that reason—the cost of a truly effective Federal trade commission—is this the only proper sum to be considered, even though it reaches the tremendous annual cost of $1,376,714,081? If it supervised business corporations thoroughly, as the Administration thinks the Interstate Commerce Commission ought to supervise railroads, it would go several times beyond this tremendous figure.

Mr. THOMAS. Has the Senator made any estimate of the number of employees or approximately the number of employees that will be necessary?

Mr. WEEKS. I am basing all my estimates on the expenditures made by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

To supervise corporations engaged in such miscellaneous and heterogeneous lines of industry as these would necessarily cost more than to supervise corporations of equal size engaged in a single line of business.

For purposes of obtaining, however, the lowest possible estimate of the annual cost of a Federal trade commission, let us arbitrarily assume that the cost of supervising corporations engaged in all these miscellaneous and heterogeneous lines of industry would cost no more than the supervision of corporations engaged in a single line of industry; and let us arbitrarily assume that the Federal trade commission, immediately upon its creation, would do its work as well and as economically as does the Interstate Commerce Commission after 27 years of experience; and, finally, in the effort to reach the lowest possible estimate, let us make the very violent assumption that the annual cost of supervising all these miscellaneous and heterogeneous corporations would not exceed the annual cost of supervision by the Interstate Commerce Commission of railroad corporations of an equal amount of capitalization.

While these assumptions obviously would permit of only the most ineffective kind of a Federal trade commission, they serve to show the lowest possible annual cost of any such commission.

The aggregate amount of capital stock of all the corporations in the United States in the year 1913 amounted to $61,738,227,730.54. (Report of Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 1913, pp. 101–102.)

This included 141,889 corporations, having an aggregate capital stock of $31,109,036,904.80, classified as commercial and financial corporations and steamboat, ferryboat, stage-line, pipeline, gas, electric light, transportation, storage, telegraph, telephone, and miscellaneous companies. Doubtless these 141,889 corporations included many that do an interstate business or that, for one reason or another, would come under a Federal trade commission. But assuming, for purposes of keeping the estimate as low as possible, that none of them do, and that the only corporations coming under the Federal trade commission would be the 163,447 industrial mercantile corporations remaining after making this arbitrary and excessive deduction, the aggregate capital stock of these 163,447 industrial and mercantile corporations is found to amount to the enormous total of $30,629,190,825.74. (Report of Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 1913, pp. 91–102.)

The aggregate capital stock of railroads which reported to the Interstate Commerce Commission in the year 1913 was $8,610,611,327. (Abstract of Statistics of Steam Railways for the year ending June 30, 1913, issued by the Interstate Commerce Commission July 9, 1914.)

The cost of supervision by the Interstate Commerce Commission of these railroads in the year ending June 30, 1913, was $1,853,269.03. (Report of Interstate Commerce Commission, 1913, p. 87.)

Invoking, for the purposes of obtaining the lowest possible estimate, all the assumptions above mentioned, and upon the basis that the annual cost of a Federal trade commission will bear the same relation to the annual cost of the Interstate Commerce Commission that the aggregate capital stock of the corporations to be supervised by the Federal trade commission bears to the aggregate capital stock of the railroads supervised by the Interstate Commerce Commission, it is found that the annual cost of the proposed Federal trade commission will be over three and fifty-five hundredths times the annual cost of the Interstate Commerce Commission, namely, the enormous sum of $8,179,105.

All this enormous annual expense of $8,179,105 would be simply the lowest possible estimate of a concededly ineffective Federal trade commission. For, as has been above explained, the cost of a commission truly effective, according to the standards expressed by the administration itself, would be immensely more than this.

All the estimates above mentioned, however, fail to include the expense of performing any of the additional functions which the amendments proposed by Senator CUMMINS and by other Senators would lay upon the Federal trade commission.

Consider, for example, the expense involved in the proposal that whenever any corporation engaged in interstate commerce proposes to issue any stock in payment of property or services the Federal trade commission shall investigate the actual value of the property or services and shall certify the same to the corporation, and the corporation shall receive such property or services in payment for capital stock at no greater value than that fixed by the commission. In the year ending June 30, 1913, the aggregate capital stock of the corporations of the United States was increased by the sum of $1,671,088,805.12. (Report of Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 1913, p. 12.)

Assuming that on the average the capital stock for property and services, issued annually by corporations which would be subject to the Federal trade commission, would equal this sum of $1,671,088,805.12, which is an underestimate considering that last year was not a particularly active year, financially and commercially, and that the normal increase in aggregate capitalization of these corporations would probably be greater, what would it cost the Federal trade commission to investigate the actual value of the property or services for which such stock would be issued?

Here, again, the only basis for calculation is the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is engaged in the somewhat analogous task of making a physical valuation of the railroad properties subject to its jurisdiction.

Hon. C. A. Prouty, formerly a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission and now Director of the Division of Valuation in the commission, said in February, 1914 (The Nation's Business, Feb. 16, 1914, p. 39):

I told the Appropriations Committee of the House last July that from what I knew about the subject then I should not advise Congress to enter upon this undertaking unless it was ready to expend at least twelve millions, and another six months' reflection has not changed that opinion.

"The capitalization of our railroads at the present time," says Mr. Prouty, "aggregates nearly $20,000,000,000." All of this is railroad property; much of it is homogeneous in character; none of it is outside the experience of men trained in the single business of railroading. Yet the valuation of this property, Mr. Prouty assumes, will take over six years and cost at least $12,000,000.

The amount of stock issued annually by corporations subject to the Federal trade commission, as above estimated, would be over one and two-thirds billions of dollars.

This would be issued by corporations engaged in every line of business—mining, lumber, and coke companies; rolling mills, foundry and machine shops, sawmills, flour, woolen, cotton, and other mills; manufacturers of cars, automobiles, elevators, agricultural implements, and all articles manufactured from metal, wood, and other material; manufacturers and refiners of sugar, molasses, sirup, and other products; ice and refrigerating companies; slaughterhouses; tannery, packing, and canning companies; dealers in coal, lumber, grain, produce, and all kinds of goods, wares, and merchandise; and, in general, every kind of financial, commercial, industrial, manufacturing, and mercantile corporation engaging in any business whatsoever across State lines.

This would include every conceivable kind of property, tangible and intangible. Only a small fraction of it would relate to any single industry; little of it would be homogeneous in character; by far the greater part of it would lie outside the experience of the most wisely experienced appraiser.

Nevertheless, the five men composing the Federal trade commission would be required to "make investigation of the actual value of said property" before the corporations could issue any stock therefor.

If seven men, composing the Interstate Commerce Commission, with all the clerical, engineering, and legal assistance at their disposal, must spend over six years and at least $12,000,000 in appraising $20,000,000,000 of comparatively homogeneous property relating to a single industry, how much time and money would five men, composing the Federal trade commission, have to spend in appraising one and two-thirds billions of dollars of miscellaneous and heterogeneous character relating to every kind of business under the sun? Probably it would be more; anyone can guess what the amount would be, but it is a fair assumption that it would cost at least $5,000,000 a year to appraise that property and do it properly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does the Senator say it would require that?

Mr. WEEKS. I say there is an amendment pending which will require it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The bill itself does not require it?

Mr. WEEKS. I think not, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Senator assume in every one of these instances that property is turned in in payment for stock?

Mr. WEEKS. That is what the bill requires, I understand.

Mr. WALSH. And that in no instance cash subscriptions are made?

Mr. WEEKS. I am not sure.

Mr. WALSH. I assume that the regulation which the bill authorizes applies to a case of stock issued for property. I assume likewise that by far the greater portion of the corporations to which the Senator referred have an actual cash capital which is obtained for the stock.

Mr. WEEKS. I think it is fair to say that the original estimate would have to be the estimate of the property, but in additional issues of capital I should say that, in many cases, it would include money paid in.

Mr. WALSH. As the Senator well knows, there are two general forms of organizing corporations. In one instance the subscribers are called upon to put up cash and with that cash property is bought. My understanding is that the bill does not pretend to superintend such a purchase of property. The other plan is to issue stock for property, usually turned in at a great overvaluation. I take it that the supervision contemplated by the bill is over the organization of corporations along that line.

Mr. WEEKS. That is the intention of this provision.

Mr. WALSH. But I take it that the aggregate capitalization of all the corporations which the Senator has now given us embraces that of corporations organized by both methods.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not want at this time to deny the correctness of that statement.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the law generally contemplates the organization of corporations whose stock is issued for cash, not property.

Mr. WEEKS. Of course, the Senator from Montana understands that this whole discussion in which I am now engaging is hypothetical. I am trying to point out what the possibilities are in connection with the expense which will be incurred by carrying on the work of this commission.

Mr. WALSH. But it occurred to me, I will say to the Senator, that it would be more valuable to us if the figures given embraced only those corporations which were organized by taking property in payment for stock and not those whose stock was issued for cash.

Mr. WEEKS. I think I will let some other Member of the Senate make such further investigation along this line as he sees fit. I have no intention to be unfair in the statements I am making; I am only trying to point out that the expense will be very great, whatever it is.

Making no allowance for additional expense due to the heterogeneous character of the industries concerned and the property which would have to be appraised, basing the estimate simply upon the expense of appraising the relatively homogeneous property which is now being valued by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the expense of the Federal trade commission in investigating "the actual value" of the property for which stock would, in any single year, be issued by the corporations subject to its jurisdiction would increase the annual cost of the Federal trade commission by about $1,000,000. If due allowance were made for increase in cost, due to the heterogeneous and miscellaneous character of the industries concerned and the property appraised, this estimate would probably have to be doubled or trebled.

Now, Mr. President, I want to take up other phases of the bill.

While in section 3 of the proposed law the powers and duties of the Bureau of Corporations and the Commissioner of Corporations are transferred to the commission provided for in this bill, there is undoubtedly some doubt as to the possibilities of the authority as constituted now of requiring our industrial concerns to make annual reports, and section 9 of the present bill adds to the former powers of the Commissioner of Corporations by making it obligatory on corporations engaged in interstate commerce to make annual reports setting forth the essential facts connected with the organization, stockholders, financial condition, and general business conduct of those concerns. While there would probably be no objection to compelling the furnishing of information about organization and financial condition, and possibly the stockholders, if this information is not to be made public, there may still be serious concern if we are to require information about the general business conduct and the manner of conducting business by the average business house. That is information which results from experience and development, taking on the elements of a trade-mark, and to provide that this must be reported and exposed to the public is little short of confiscation, for under its provisions many concerns will practically give to their commercial rivals the reasons which have enabled them to be successful while those who are doing a similar business may not have had the business acumen or the wisdom to adopt such progressive and advanced methods.

When we are legislating along lines which will affect those matters which are brought in direct competition with the activities of foreign nations we may well hesitate about handicapping our own institutions and thus preventing their competing successfully with their foreign rivals. Of the European nations, Germany has made in recent years the greatest strides in developing not only home but foreign trade, and we may well look over their methods in any action which they have consummated in recent years. It is worth knowing that there is nothing on the statute books of Germany which compares in any way with our antitrust law, and, indeed, they follow a directly contrary practice by bringing the Government itself not only into approval of combinations but frequently into cooperation with them.

Neither is there anything which will intimately compare with the trades commission bills which are now pending. Their laws do require that assets shall bear a constant relation to nominal capital, which would not be burdensome on any corporation, and they impose personal liability upon promoters and directors for losses which may be incurred as a result of untrue or misleading information, which would certainly be proper legislation for any nation to adopt, and they also punish efforts at destructive competition. Further than that the German Government has given free rein to the activities of its citizens and the German courts sustain agreements covering outputs, fixing prices, and similar activities.

One of the triumphs of the present administration has been the separation of the telegraph and telephone companies. To the layman it would seem that a combination of these two services was perfectly natural. In hundreds and thousands of cases the same operator could perform both services without any difficulty whatever, and therefore it would produce an economy which in the end would be beneficial to the user; but under our antitrust law power is given the National Government to proceed against such combinations, and the segregation has taken place. At the very time this divorce measure was culminating the Postmaster General in an annual report was urging the advantages of combining these two systems and having them managed by the Government in conjunction with the Postal Service. There is serious doubt in the minds of most people who have investigated this question about the advisability and the economy of Government operation. I personally have no doubt that the Postal Service could be conducted for very much less if under corporate control; but, leaving aside for the moment that consideration, could there be anything more inharmonious than for one department of the Government to be proceeding legally and properly, as the law now stands, against a combination which another department is not only in favor of but is making an argument for in an annual report to Congress?

The whole tendency of the trades-commission bill is toward regulated monopoly. The President is urging its passage, and the administration therefore is committed to this policy, and yet it is not at all in accord with his position before he assumed office, as I have pointed out earlier to-day.

The passage of this kind of a bill, instead of reassuring business, is going to add to the difficulties and uncertainties and will result in lessening activities in all business affairs. If it is desirable to pass such a bill at all—which I do not admit, because I do not see any public demand for it—it must be coupled with a desire that the law shall be absolutely explicit in its terms. There is not a man in the Senate who can give a definition in a hundred words of unfair competition which will cover 3 per cent of what the courts and the commission itself may find to be unfair competition; and, if there were no other reasons to urge against this bill, its indefiniteness and the possibility for harm which will come from it rather than the benefits to accrue would be sufficient to warrant if not impel every Senator to vote against it.

One of the inhibitions in section 2 of the pending bill relates to the fixing of prices. Undoubtedly there may be gross injustice done in occasional instances by a large and strong organization cutting prices so as to destroy the business of a competitor. If that kind of conduct is aimed at and there is not sufficient law now—I think there is—provision should be made to punish willful and destructive action of that character; but to make a general proposition applying to business concerns of such character would be, in my judgment, repressive in the extreme and would materially militate against real competition in business. In fact, discrimination in prices is essential to competition. A merchant is overstocked in some line of goods; he wishes to clear his shelves for the up-to-date product which the next season will demand. Unless he makes a very low price he can not accomplish this; in fact, there can be no difference in prices in the same locality without discrimination, and we all know that there is a difference in prices existing in the same towns. I have no doubt one can go to the general market in Washington and make purchases of any product disposed of there at a lower price than it can be purchased in some section where rents are higher and purchasers are supposed to be willing to pay higher prices. I had brought to my attention only recently the sale of a certain brand of butter sold by two different merchants in Washington, one located in the market district and the other in the northwest section of the city, in which the price charged at the market was 10 cents a pound less than that charged by the other merchant. It would be folly in its extremest form to attempt to regulate or prevent competition of this character.

Furthermore, competition in sections somewhat remote should not depend on the selling of goods by a similar concern at the same price. If a large corporation sells its product in Chicago at one price and in New York at a lower price for the purpose of controlling the market in New York and driving out competitors, that is an action which, if the facts are demonstrated, should be prevented by legal process; but to say that a merchant doing business in different sections of the United States should not sell in one locality cheaper than another would be to say that he could not recoup himself for differences in freight rates, for differences in rentals which he pays in different localities, for the difference in the price which labor commands in different sections, and for a multitude of other reasons which will occur to anyone familiar with trade which would make such action most embarrassing in the conduct of business.

If competition in prices and in methods is to be so carefully scrutinized, how is an individual to start a new business enterprise? He must get custom from some one. He may get it by having better selections of goods, by selling his goods at a lower price, by any one of hundreds of inducements familiar to trade; but if he is going to be proceeded against for unfair competition in many or any of these methods, it would be impossible to start new business enterprises, and therefore all competition would be destroyed by simply keeping in trade those who by a survival or waiting-out process had been able to maintain themselves during the course of their business lives.

Substantially all competition is not intended to injure or destroy; it is the life of trade, and a general proviso which will lay the business man open to the charge of unfair competition should not be considered.

It is provided that the commission shall have full power to examine books, documents, correspondence, contracts, memoranda, and all other papers relating to or in any way affecting the business in which the corporation is engaged; that it may make copies of these, and that it may give to the public such of this material as it considers desirable or necessary. I doubt if the courts have ever been given such sweeping authority to rifle correspondence and to examine personal papers with power to publish them as is conferred in this bill on the commission which is proposed.

We have established freedom of the press and freedom of speech. Freedom to do business along sane lines is quite as important to the welfare of the country, and yet we propose to repress and restrict this freedom to a degree which has never been considered by even the most autocratic of nations. It is not too much to say that the authority given the commission places in its hands the power to destroy any or every corporation subject to its jurisdiction. Every business enterprise gathers from time to time information and develops methods of efficiency and economy which are not known to its competitors. They are its trade secrets, and the manner in which they are developed and handled results in the success or failure of the business. To create a power to obtain these secrets and then to exploit them to the public is nothing short of legal despotism, and would be of every value to conscienceless competitors.

It may be fairly assumed, I suppose, that the employees of the commission will be honest and will maintain reasonable secrecy about the work in which they are engaged; yet the tremendous value of a trade secret to a rival, even if the commission did not see fit to publish it, would be such a temptation that it almost goes without saying that it would not be prevented from getting into the hands of others than those who have a right to it. While the bill provides a penalty for the divulging of information it would not, in my opinion, be sufficient in many cases to prevent improper use being made of information obtained.

The commission has the power under this act to enjoin a corporation which is doing anything which it considers to constitute unfair competition; but what is unfair competition depends on the individual opinion of the five commissioners. Anyone familiar at all with business must know that no commission of five men can have any familiarity whatever with the methods of doing business as conducted by several hundred thousand corporations representing the varied industries of a great country. No man could in a lifetime make himself sufficiently familiar with the operations of a small percentage of these corporations to warrant his passing on the question of whether it was conducting its business fairly or unfairly.

Furthermore, if the commission is to restrain corporations from doing business unfairly, on information submitted to it, the very fact that the corporation is restrained would militate against its business temporarily and would enable its rival to take advantage of the temporary lull in its business to gather in such of its business as might be affected by such action; so that an injunction in such cases would be of serious and permanent consequence to the enjoined party, even if the contention made by the commission that it was engaged in unfair competition failed to be sustained.

I think no one can make a reasonable objection to regulation of corporations engaged in interstate commerce which are engaged in willful actions which are inimical to the public interest; but this bill would exert over the business of the country an inquisitorial and prejudicial influence which, in my judgment, will be beyond all reason, even assuming that the commission is made up of the best men obtainable and that they conduct their investigations and reach their conclusions with care and prudence.

If this legislation were to be applied to corporations and not to partnerships the tendency would be to increase partnerships and in the same degree decrease corporations, which have become the accepted way for conducting large business operations. It is well that this should be so, because the forming of a corporation and the issuing of stock certificates enables the dividing up of business enterprises among a large number of people, acting as a distributer of returns obtained and of wealth, which can not be harmful but must be beneficial to the country.

For example, before the organization of the United States Steel Co. it was undoubtedly true that the steel business was controlled by less than 100 men, if not substantially owned by less than 100 men. Now there are more than 100,000 stockholders in the United States Steel Co., including a large amount of stock held by the employees themselves. Can anyone doubt that this policy of employees becoming directly interested in the business of a corporation will be beneficial from every standpoint, not only to the employees themselves but to the corporation as well, and how can any better cooperative method be developed than by following such a course?

A State can not pass repressive, drastic, or burdensome legislation without affecting capital and indirectly driving capital to places where it can do business without being hampered. I have been told by manufacturers in States where legislation had placed them at a disadvantage in competition with similar manufacturers in other States that they could in many cases afford to give away their real estate and replace it in another State if they were assured that the State into which they were moving would not in the immediate future adopt similar legislation. I instance this as an example of the effect which legislation may have on enterprises in any particular locality.

If we are going to place unreasonable burdens on American capital and American labor as well, there is nothing to prevent its seeking other fields of activity. We know that foreign capital has frequently been employed in the United States because it could probably obtain larger returns here than in the country from which it came. There is a constant movement all over the world toward China, Russia, and South American countries, which are comparatively undeveloped. No one doubts the possibilities in all of these sections, and we should have a care that we do not take action which will not only check the flow of foreign capital to our shores, but will at the same time encourage our capital to go into other fields.

Our population is increasing rapidly and our industrial and agricultural possibilities have not been reached, but it would not take very much drastic and uncalled-for legislation to stop this development; in fact, it has been stopped as far as our public service corporations are concerned. They can not obtain now sufficient returns on invested capital to warrant investing additional money in their enterprises. The Pennsylvania Railroad built 12 miles of new track in the year 1913. Does anyone think that that is a good sign, and does not everyone know that if the inducing of investments of capital in railroad stocks had not been chilled, it would quite likely have built many times that number of miles, and would it not have been well for every business in the United States if it had done so?

Mr. President, I want now to give a brief résumé of the points that I have made and my reasons for opposing this legislation. I will summarize my expressions of opposition to the pending legislation as follows:

First. There is no public demand for it. This is evidenced by the failure of business men to appear before either the Judiciary Committee of the House or the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate in its advocacy and by the general expressions of boards of trade and chambers of commerce all over the United States in favor of a policy of much more careful and thorough investigation being made before any action is taken, even assuming that it is desirable to legislate on the subject.

Second. That this legislation is involving the Government in policies one of which is practically the antithesis of the other—namely, forbidding action on the one hand and regulating it on the other. This conflict of action will product inextricable confusion.

Third. If legislation of this character is to be adopted, the Sherman Antitrust Act should either be repealed or modified to put it in harmony with this newly adopted policy. In any case, it seems to me that the Sherman Antitrust Act should be amended so that hereafter it should not apply to public-service corporations, which are now in effect a regulated monopoly, and there may be many cases where consolidations could properly be made, or consolidations which have been made might properly be allowed to stand, if good public policy were alone to be considered. The law at present forbids such action.

Fourth. I believe there is now sufficient law to enable the carrying out of any desirable feature there may be in this legislation; that is, to prevent willful and destructive competition. I have no doubt that the courts would act affirmatively on any plea to take such action if the facts demonstrated the truth of the charges.

Fifth. Investigation shows that when real competition is not willful and destructive it is not difficult to compete effectively against even the strongest and largest organizations. This is well illustrated in the case of the growth of independent steel plants against the opposition of the United States Steel Co. and the growth of independent oil refining companies against the Standard Oil Co. Both of these concerns depend largely on a natural product which is limited in the area where it can be produced and in ownership, yet statistics show that the independent companies are now gaining, as they have been for many years, in proportion to the total output, on both of these companies.

Furthermore, an investigation would doubtless show that beyond a reasonable limit any expansion of a business can not be made successfully, because the qualities that control a successful business must be limited in the time that can be devoted to it and the area which can be covered by it.

Sixth. By it we are going to place handicaps on our own business operations brought into competition with foreign capital and enterprises, for in no other country is business repressed as a result of legislation as it is in the United States even now, and this proposed action will add to the confusion and to the difficulty which our business men will have to overcome in competing with foreign countries for international trade.

Seventh. It will be an enormously expensive commission; the expense finally may run up to the tens of millions, and, in any case, it will add to the public service an army of employees, so that it will be a contributing element to the tendency of bureaucracy and increasing Government expenses which will, unless we have a care, finally involve us in government by Government employees.

Eighth. I have no disposition to place myself in antagonism to those who wish to prevent willful and destructive business policies, but if any legislation of this character is to be adopted it should apply to those who are guilty of such action and not include in its provisions the vast number of business men who are doing their best to conduct their business operations legally and fairly. By applying this law to these latter classes a serious injustice is being done them, because it will increase the cost to them of doing business; it will place it in the power of the commission to obtain and to make public such trade methods of corporations as they have which may give them an advantage over their competitors. The whole principle involved in the scrutinizing of books, correspondence, and methods, as provided for in this bill, is obnoxious to every sentiment of freedom of business operations.

Ninth. Before any further action is taken in pushing this legislation a commission should be appointed to carefully and thoroughly examine into the methods employed by other countries in such matters and to report a carefully worked-out plan which will provide for such supervision, regulation, and relationship as our Government should bear to business operations; and the Sherman Antitrust Act and all other legislation should be made to conform to this plan. No other course will put our business men in a consistent position where they may conduct their operations free from unreasonable expense and investigation and in which they may have the best opportunity to compete with their foreign rivals.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, out of order, I desire to present a letter I have received from the United Spanish War Veterans of Manila, together with resolutions. I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

POWERS OF INVESTIGATION OF COMMISSION.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has made a very interesting address, in which, as I believe, he has very greatly exaggerated the cost of the proposed trade commission and the extent of its operations. He has assumed that because there are 300,000 corporations in this country probably all of them are engaged in interstate commerce. We know how small a proportion of them are actually engaged in such commerce.

In the second place, it seems to be assumed that all of the powers granted by the bill are to be applied to every corporation that comes within the jurisdiction of the commission, whereas, as a matter of fact, the power is simply given, as it must be given, to investigate all corporations; but, of course, investigation will only be made of those concerning whom there is some probable cause to believe that they are violating the law.

In the next place, we must bear in mind that this commission will cost only what Congress appropriates for the expenses of its operations, and that the extent of its operations is thus always within the control of Congress. Of course if this commission is to be the scourge that the Senator from Massachusetts assumes that it will be, and is to be as costly as the Senator assumes it will be, the law providing for it will not stay upon the statute books long.

Extensive power must be given to the commission, but that does not necessarily assume that the power is to be exercised with reference to every corporation in the United States, or even to every corporation that is engaged in interstate commerce. The powers of investigation proposed to be conferred are not much larger than those conferred upon the Bureau of Corporations. Who has heard of the operations of that bureau bankrupting the Government?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I should prefer to finish my statement. I have promised that I would only occupy a few moments.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I want to ask the Senator from Nevada a question about the Bureau of Corporations. I desire to ask the Senator from Nevada whether or not the Bureau of Corporations has thus far attempted to exercise any of its powers compulsorily?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I do not understand that it has.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. So that its powers are not contested.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am speaking of its powers of investigation. Its powers of investigation are nearly as great as those proposed to be conferred upon the trade commission. Besides, Congress will always have this commission, its expense and its operation, within its control by reason of its power to appropriate.

Mr. President, the powers of this commission are to be in aid of existing law—first, in aid of the courts; second, in aid of the Attorney General; third, in independent investigations which will bring to sight violations of the law, the obligation being imposed upon the commission of bringing those violations to the attention of the Attorney General.

The only other extra matter of jurisdiction that is imposed upon this commission is to ascertain whether unfair practices exist and to condemn them. Does anyone believe that all of the 300,000 corporations in this country are engaged in unfair practices? If they are, then there is all the more necessity for legislation of this kind, for we are then near universal corruption and demoralization; but we all know that such practices are resorted to simply by the powerful with a view to destroying the weak, and that the powerful are comparatively few in number, though their resources are great, and that it is the duty of society to protect the individual against these gigantic creations of the law which whilst beneficial when held within the limits of the design of their creation can become most prejudicial to the public interest if allowed to pursue their own way unchecked by administrative control. These practices are resorted to by but few, and investigation will quickly, in my judgment, through the processes of publicity, control most of them; and those that are not controlled through the processes of publicity will feel the force of the law, and ought to feel the force of the law.

The same dire predictions that are being raised to-day with reference to the extent and the operation of this proposed law, its cost, its pressure upon the freedom of the people, have been indulged with reference to every act of progressive legislation in the history of the Republic. We all know that those predictions have not been true predictions, and that the results have demonstrated their inaccuracy. At all events, whatever legislation we may enact upon this subject will be tentative; it must stand the test of public opinion; and will be quickly repealed if not sustained by public opinion.

INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER CO.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document the brief of the Government in the so-called Harvester case, pending in the district court of Minnesota. It is very difficult to get the brief; it is an important document, and I therefore wish to have it printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I dislike very much to object to the printing of this or any other matter; but it seems to have been determined by the majority that we shall have no morning hour for some time to come; that we are to take a recess from day to day, which will cut off a great many Senators from presenting morning business. I have an item of morning business myself which I have been waiting for a day or two to present, but I am unable to do so. I therefore feel obliged to object to any morning business being transacted until we can have a morning hour, so that any Senator who has morning business may be able to present it. I object to the printing of the brief referred to by the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 25, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Great Spirit, everywhere present, working in and through the hearts of men, approving, disapproving, encouraging, discouraging, "A voice crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make His paths straight," may our hearts be susceptible to the holy influence; may we hear the voice and obey its call. "Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? Or who shall stand in His holy place? He that hath clean hands and a pure heart; who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity, nor sworn deceitfully. He shall receive the blessing from the Lord, and righteousness from the God of his salvation." So may we strive, so may we attain. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following personal requests, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SINNOTT requests leave of absence, for five days, on account of illness in his family.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

To the SPEAKER: I ask the House for a leave of absence for 30 days to take effect August 5 in order that I may go to Minnesota to investigate the many complaints of damages encountered by a large number of farmers through the flooding of their lands by the operating of the reservoir system at the headwaters of the Mississippi. My reason for asking for this leave of absence in advance of the period when I wish it to take effect is because the parties interested in having this examination made desire a time to be fixed when mass meetings may be held at two different places and, in addition, to allow me time to go over a part of the ground.

Respectfully,

C. A. LINDBERGH.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to these requests? Without objection, they will be granted.

There was no objection.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] sends up what he says is a privileged resolution. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That clause 1 of Rule XIV be amended by striking out the period after the word "personality" and inserting a comma, and adding thereto the following: "and no Member shall, under leave to print or extend remarks, refer directly or indirectly to another Member of the House."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is not privileged.

The SPEAKER. It is not privileged, and there is no use to take time on it. It goes to the Committee on Rules.

DISPOSITION OF LANDS, FORT BERTHOLD INDIAN RESERVATION, N. DAK.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 4988.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] calls up a House bill with Senate amendments. Does the gentleman know whether it has been referred to the committee or not?

Mr. NORTON. No; it has not been. It is on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4988) to provide for the disposition of certain lands in the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, N. Dak.

With Senate amendments.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. Wait until the Clerk reads the amendments. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

THE GENERAL DAM ACT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16053.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 16053) to amend the general dam act. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16053, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16053, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16053) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the Clerk last evening read the first paragraph of the bill. Is it proper to stop there and offer an amendment, or read the entire section?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can offer an amendment to the first paragraph.

Mr. ADAMSON. I thought bills of this sort were read by sections.

The CHAIRMAN. I understood that the first section has been read.

Mr. ADAMSON. Only the first paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The first section would have to be read before an amendment could be offered. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SECTION 1. That when consent has been or may hereafter be granted by Congress, either directly or indirectly through any duly authorized official or officials of the United States, to any persons to construct and maintain a dam for water power or other purpose——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. There seems to be only one section in this bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. The Clerk is reading the original bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill that the Chair has before him has sections 1, 2, 3, and 4.

Mr. ADAMSON. Perhaps the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has the wrong copy.

Mr. MANN. I think I am correct. Let me ask the attention of the Chair as to what amendments will be in order. The bill provides that the general dam act "be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows." Then come various sections of amendments of the general dam act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had not noticed that phase of this bill. Undoubtedly there is but one section in the bill.

Mr. MANN. I think there is only one section in the bill, but I am inclined to think that it ought to be treated either as sections or paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. It occurs to the Chair in the same way. From the way in which this bill is drawn there is but one section in the bill, but there are a number of different paragraphs.

Mr. ADAMSON. What I wish to do, Mr. Chairman, is to offer a substitute for all after the enacting clause, and I send the substitute to the Clerk's desk. The reason for that is that the committee, in various sessions, and Members of Congress, in various conferences, have about agreed upon 14 or 15 amendments. There were so many of them that we had a new committee print made as a whole. The committee would now like to have that substitute considered instead of reading the original bill. I want to offer that substitute, and I want to ask unanimous consent that, instead of taking time to perfect the original bill by considering the amendments, we consider the substitute and perfect it, as it contains all of the original bill and the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. LENROOT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would have no objection to that course being taken provided it is understood that the substitute, for the purpose of amendment, shall be considered as an original bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to abridge the right of amendment or of debate. I want to exercise the utmost liberality on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us see if the Chair understands the situation as to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent that the substitute that he will offer will be considered as the original bill for the purpose of offering amendments. Is there objection?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. If this is to be considered as the original bill, amendments offered will be subject to amendment as if the original bill had been read?

Mr. ADAMSON. I am perfectly willing that any privileges which the gentleman would have had as to the original bill he shall have on this substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the enacting clause——

The CHAIRMAN. May I ask the gentleman if the substitute is what is called the committee print with amendments?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; H. R. 16053. There are plenty of copies here. I will have the pages carry them around. The way it is printed the committee amendments are indicated by brackets, and of course the Clerk will read it as continuous matter, and when it goes to the printer the brackets will be eliminated.

Mr. MANN. Then the print that is now being considered as a substitute is the print marked "[Committee print with amendments], H. R. 16053"?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; that is it. I hope gentlemen who want copies will get this print instead of the original.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will also ask unanimous consent that instead of reading the substitute clear through before any amendments are read, the substitute may be read according to the sections as numbered in the substitute, so that we will not be amending the first part of the bill when we are considering the last part of it.

Mr. ADAMSON. The sections are all numbered, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be read by the sections as numbered.

The CHAIRMAN. For the purpose of amendment?

Mr. ADAMSON. For the purpose of amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 23, 1910, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That when consent has been or may hereafter be granted by Congress, either directly or indirectly through any duly authorized official or officials of the United States, to any persons to construct and maintain a dam for water power or other purpose across or in any of the navigable waters of the United States, such dam shall not be built or commenced until the plans and specifications for such dam and all accessory works, together with such drawings of the proposed construction and such map of the proposed location as may be required for a full understanding of the subject, have been submitted to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers for their approval, nor until they shall have approved such plans and specifications and the location of such dam and accessory works; and after such approval it shall not be lawful to deviate from such plans or specifications either before or after completion of the structure unless the modification of such plans or specifications has previously been submitted to and received the approval of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers."

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, that is not my understanding of the agreement as to the manner in which it shall be read.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understood the agreement, it was that the substitute was to be read in lieu of the original bill, and that the portions with lines stricken through should not be read, but that all other portions of the bill should be read.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Including those in brackets, but not including the language stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 1, insert:

"Such plans, specifications, and drawings shall be submitted within one year after the date of the approval of the act authorizing the construction."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the present law provides that the construction of the dam authorized shall be begun within one year after the passage of the act authorizing it. The pending bill provides that the construction shall be begun within one year after the approval of the project by the Secretary of War. As a result there is a period after the approval of the act authorizing the construction, during which there is no obligation whatever upon the part of the grantee to take any action whatever looking to the construction of the work authorized by the act.

Now, this would not be so important were it not for the language of section 8, which refers to the assignability of projects authorized. Section 8 provides:

That no property or project installed and operated under the provisions or benefits of this act shall be assigned or transferred except upon the written consent of the Secretary of War.

Now, mark that that section does not prevent an assignment of the rights and benefits granted under this act nor does the subsequent section, prohibiting the assignment of the property or project for the purpose of creating a monopoly, apply to the rights and privileges granted by the act itself. As a result there will be a period after the approval of the act authorizing the construction, during which the grantee may assign the rights and benefits granted by this act to any person or any corporation, regardless of whether that corporation be a monopoly, or whatever it may be, without the consent of the Secretary of War. If this bill remains as it is now, there is absolutely nothing in it to prevent the gathering up by great water-power companies of the sites upon navigable streams and holding them absolutely without any development whatever for an indefinite period. I do not believe that this situation was contemplated by the committee in the drafting of this bill, but it seems to me there can be absolutely no question about the proposition that it is the effect of the failure to provide, first, a definite period within which these plans shall be submitted, and, second, of the failure to provide that the rights and benefits granted by the act itself shall be assignable only under the same conditions as the property and projects installed under the provisions of the act.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is there no provision in the bill at all in reference to the time for commencing the construction as compared with the date of the approval of a special act?

Mr. ANDERSON. Absolutely none.

Mr. MANN. Is there in the existing law?

Mr. ANDERSON. In the present law there is.

Mr. MANN. I thought there was in the present law.

Mr. ANDERSON. The present law requires that the construction shall be begun within one year after the approval of the act. This bill requires that it shall be begun within one year after the approval of the plans and specifications required by the act.

Mr. MANN. There is one thing that I think perhaps the gentleman has not taken into consideration. It may be that Congress wishes to change the policy. Special acts authorizing the construction of dams over navigable rivers are now required only where the river is navigable in two or more States, or where it is a boundary line between two States. The Secretary of War has the authority to grant a permit for a dam across a stream which is wholly within the limits of one State; and when the dam act was originally drawn, the gentleman will notice that it read:

When consent has been or may hereafter be granted by Congress, either directly or indirectly.

Now, that consent is granted indirectly where we grant the authority to the Secretary of War to permit the construction of a dam across a stream wholly within one State, because that is by authority of an old act of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, section 12 provides that the work shall be begun within 12 months after the approval of the plans. A work of such magnitude as these are is financed with considerable difficulty. We did not think it right to commence counting the time against the project until they had succeeded in financing it and had an approval of the plans so that they could go to work. As to whether or not you will limit them as to the preparation of plans, and so forth, is a matter of policy. The committee did not think it necessary to do that; but if the Committee of the Whole thinks it is necessary, it can do it.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Is it possible under this bill to obtain rights and hold them for an indefinite number of years? Is there any provision in the bill that would answer that objection? The gentleman from Minnesota says that it is possible to do that.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think section 12 would settle it; it puts it in the discretion of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I think it is clear that section 12 does not put any limitation on it. It might do it as a matter of practical operation. Does not the gentleman think that even if the time suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota is too short, there ought to be a limit of some kind?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; I was just going to suggest that. I do not want to nullify the projects because of failure to get ready at a certain time. I was going to ask if the gentleman from Minnesota would be willing to make it two years?

Mr. ANDERSON. As far as I am concerned, I would be willing to do that, but we should have some time in which the plans should be submitted.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman will understand that these are large propositions, and it frequently takes some little time to get them financed, but if the gentleman will modify his amendment to provide for two years I will accept it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by inserting "two years" instead of "one year."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment as suggested. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, we will not resist that amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question. The copy of the bill which I have in my hand, which I think is the one under consideration, has a note on the first page which reads:

[NOTE.—The parts printed in italics are new; omit line stricken through; proposed amendment in brackets.]

I had supposed that meant that where the lines were stricken through they were in the existing law, and where there was no change in the law, if new matter was inserted, it was printed in italics.

Mr. ADAMSON. That note refers to the bill reported by the committee. If any old law was affected by these amendments, it would be stricken through. The italics were new matter in the bill, and the committee amendments are in brackets.

Mr. MANN. I have a copy of the bill reported to the House, where the same note is made that the parts printed in italics are new. That may be correct, but what I want to get at is whether all the new matter in this bill which is not in existing law was put in italics. When I first got a copy of the bill I supposed that was the case, and I did not take the original law and compare it, as I otherwise would have done, because I thought this undertook to show by difference in print what was existing law and what was the new proposition.

Mr. ADAMSON. The bill as reported by the committee printed in italics the new suggestions. That in roman is the old law.

Mr. MANN. I read under section 12:

That the grantee shall commence the construction of the dam and accessory works within one year from the date of the approval herein provided.

That is all in roman.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think that is a misprint. I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota if that is not true?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; the clerk of the committee went over the whole of this after the committee got through with it, and I think that is a mistake.

Mr. MANN. Does not the same thing occur in other parts of the bill?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It is possible.

Mr. LENROOT. There is scarcely a section of the bill that is not changed.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not deny that some parts of the old law may be omitted, as far as the difference in type is concerned.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me call the gentleman's attention to line 6, page 2, the added words "and all accessory works." They are not in italics, and I do not find them in the original bill, and yet they are words changing the whole policy of the section. Ought not those words "and all accessory works" be italicized?

Mr. ADAMSON. If they are in the old law, they ought to be italicized; but I do not attach the same importance or materiality to it that the gentleman does.

Mr. BRYAN. As far as they are new words, they ought to be italicized.

Mr. ADAMSON. The intention of the committee was to print the bill as indicated in the note; but mistakes will happen in the best regulated families.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 7 and 8, and page 2, lines 1 and 2, strike out the following language: "That when consent has been or may hereafter be granted by Congress, either directly or indirectly, through any duly authorized official or officials of the United States," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That when hereafter authority is granted."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the Adamson bill provides "that when consent has been or may hereafter be granted by Congress, either directly or indirectly, through any duly authorized official or officials of the United States, to any persons to construct and maintain a dam for water power or other purpose across or in any of the navigable waters of the United States, and so forth."

To begin with, the word "consent" was there substituted for the word "authority" in the original bill. The effect of substituting the word "consent" for the word "authority" is necessarily to weaken the thing which the constructor of the dam must get. Under the old bill he was to get "authority," and under the Adamson bill he is to get "consent," either directly or indirectly, through any duly authorized official or officials of the United States. Under the old law he is to get the authority I have just mentioned from Congress; and those broad words are not set forth in the original act.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Under the existing law the authority is not required to be by special act, as I stated a moment ago, in streams which lie wholly within the limits of a State. There is a provision of law authorizing the Secretary of War to permit obstructions to navigation in a stream wholly within the limits of a State; and so that if he did grant such authority under that provision of law for a dam it should still come under the provisions of the general dam act, there was inserted "directly or indirectly the authority of Congress," because one is the general authority under which the Secretary of War acts, and the other is a specific authority by a special bill.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, according to the gentleman from Illinois, that is to cover then a grant in a State, within the limits of a State, but this is a general act; and if we want to draw that line of distinction, I think it is a very dangerous ground to mix into this act that State-rights proposition. We have been getting along all right under the 1910 act, and to add that verbiage here, I believe, weakens the requirements and lessens the authority that the applicant has to obtain, and I do not believe we ought to put it in that way. I believe that we ought to retain the same words that we have in the original act as to this authority.

Mr. MANN. What are the original words?

Mr. BRYAN. The original act reads in this way:

That when hereafter authority is granted by Congress to any person to construct and maintain a dam.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is reading the act of 1906.

Mr. BRYAN. I read 1906. The 1910 amendment is this:

That when hereafter authority is granted or may hereafter be granted.

Mr. Chairman, I recognize the fact that I was basing my argument upon the act of 1906 instead of the act of 1910.

Mr. MANN. The reason for the change which was made was because of the authority to the War Department to grant these permits over navigable streams wholly within a State, which under the original act probably by inadvertence were not permitted under the general dam law.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the pages of the volume before me had turned over, and I got the act of 1906 instead of the act of 1910. I therefore ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to strike out the word "consent," in line 7, page 1, and to substitute therefor the word "authority."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 7, by striking out the word "consent" and inserting the word "authority."

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that at least that far the proposition made by the gentleman from Washington is tenable, and that the word "authority" would mean more and be more substantial than the word "consent." They ought to get authority to do a certain thing, not merely consent to do it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] if he would have any objection to inserting both words, "consent or authority"?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the only reason we use the word "consent" is because we do not want to mislead anybody about what we do. If we use the word "authority," some people will have the notion that we are giving them a charter to go ahead and do something independent of any other right or law.

Mr. MANN. There might be cases where authority was granted apart from consent, where the Government was constructing locks, for instance. As a matter of fact, for years Congress has passed special bridge laws and some special dam laws, where in some cases we used the word "authority" and in some cases the word "consent." I take it they probably mean the same thing.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I think myself that in this connection to a trained mind they will mean the same thing, but some people are misled by the word "authority." I have received numbers of letters from people complaining that power companies who built dams had not paid them for the overflow lands, and things of that sort, and charging Congress with misleading the people because it authorized something done that injured the people. I have explained to those people that all Congress did was to consent, under certain restrictions and conditions, to have obstructions put in a navigable stream, and that we did not charter or authorize anyone to do anything but that, and it seemed to me that the word "consent" came nearer putting everybody on notice of exactly what Congress did than the word "authority."

Mr. MANN. But we have used the word "authority" in some of these special acts?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes. Does the gentleman propose to use both words?

Mr. MANN. Yes. Make it read this way:

That when consent or authority has been or may hereafter be granted—

And so forth.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois accept that modification of his amendment?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Very well.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment as indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. What is the amendment now?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, after the word "consent," in line 7, insert the words "or authority."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That as a part of such approval such conditions and stipulations may be imposed as the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers may deem necessary to protect the present and future interests of the United States, which may include the condition that the persons constructing or maintaining such dam shall construct, maintain, and operate in connection therewith, without expense to the United States, a lock or locks, booms, sluices, or any other structure or structures which the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers or Congress then may deem necessary in the interests of navigation, in accordance with plans made a part of such approval; and also that in case such facilities of navigation shall not be made a part of such original approval and construction, whenever Congress shall deem such facilities necessary, the persons owning such dam shall convey to the United States, free of cost, title to such land as may be required for such constructions and approaches, and shall grant to the United States free water power or power generated from water power for building and operating such constructions, and in such original approval, at the discretion of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers, may be required to maintain and operate such lock without expense to the United States [: Provided, That whenever Congress has heretofore provided, either directly or indirectly, through any official or department of the United States Government, for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a lock, free of cost to the United States, as may be deemed necessary for navigation by the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers in any dam in navigable waters authorized by law at the date of passage of this act, in all such cases such obligation shall continue to be of full force and effect].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2, in line 3, on page 3, by striking out the word "then" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "at any time."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the present law provides that the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, insert in the approval of the project a provision that the grantee shall construct a lock in the dam constructed by it at any time that he may deem necessary in the interests of navigation. This bill seeks to change that by requiring the Secretary of War in the beginning, in the approval of the project, to determine whether within the next 50 years the grantee shall be required not only to construct a lock at his own expense needed for navigation, but it requires the Secretary of War at that time to determine the character of the lock and provide the plans and specifications for it. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is said by the chairman of the committee in his report on this bill in its original form that this bill seeks as a primary purpose promoting navigation. Now, if that were so, Mr. Chairman, can you imagine any dam upon any navigable portion of any stream that will promote navigation without a lock? Instead of promoting it, the bill itself permits the absolute obstruction of navigation upon a stream. And whenever it permits certain obstructions to navigation we ought to save the right to say to those who put the obstruction in the stream that whenever navigation shall make it necessary they shall construct a lock and make the stream at least as nagavitable as it was before they put the dam in the stream. Now, the excuse that is made for this change of the law is the excuse that is made for every other change in the bill, that it is necessary in order to induce capital to invest in water-power enterprises; and let me remind the committee, as I said the other day, that there is not a line of new legislation in this bill that is not a letting down of the bars and a concession to capital and water-power companies. I do not say that it is not necessary in some cases; I am not criticizing that; but let no man misunderstand what this bill does. It is a surrender of public rights that we have reserved under the present law. We ought to understand that. Now, is it necessary? Mr. Chairman, the trouble during the past two years has not been that the 1910 act was too strict and too stringent, as the committee would have the House believe.

The trouble has been that Congress has deemed that that act was not stringent enough, and it has refused to grant franchises or concessions under the act of 1910 because it believed the public interest was not sufficiently protected and demanded further amendments, such as compensation to the Government. The House will remember the Coosa River Dam bill passed two years ago granting a franchise to the Alabama Power Co. They were willing to develop that dam under this very act of 1910 without these concessions, and the House by a close vote passed it. It was passed by the Senate, and President Taft vetoed that bill because it granted too many concessions to the Alabama Power Co. and did not provide for compensation to the Government.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman think that paragraph D, on page 6 of the bill, safeguards the interests of the Government to the extent it can require the same conditions of navigability to be restored as exists when the contract or approval is made?

Mr. LENROOT. No; not at all, Mr. Chairman, unless this amendment I have proposed shall be adopted. If the Secretary of War shall fail to decide in the first instance that the lock is necessary, no matter how great the obstruction the dam may be to the navigability of a river that lock can never be put in afterwards except at the expense of the Government of the United States; and if it is an obstruction, whether now or 50 years from now, that lock, if necessary, ought to be put in at the expense of the party who makes the obstruction.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that if the bill passes in its present form without reserving to the Government the right to build the lock in connection with the dam, the Government could not build it itself.

Mr. LENROOT. That is probably true as well, because the present law does reserve the right to the Government to build a lock in connection with the dam, and this bill eliminates that.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at some of the inaccuracies of the gentleman from Wisconsin in his statement of the provisions of this bill, and it is rather surprising, in view of his splendid intelligence and the care with which he has read this measure. He stated that there was a general letting down in the interests of capital in the provisions of this bill. On page 7, section 5, you will find the italicized words:

> And in the use and operation of such navigation facilities the interests of navigation shall be paramount to the uses of such dam by such grantee for power purposes.

Under those italicized words they may subtract 50 per cent from the efficiency of the dam, and one of the dams of this very character is in the gentleman's own district, and he does not seem to know what conditions are there, as I stated yesterday.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman think this provision adds anything?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; it adds very materially.

Mr. LENROOT. Has Congress this discretion and the paramount right as to power purposes?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Congress could do it by contract, as the language of the Chandler-Dunbar case indicates. But we expressly provide by contract it shall not be done, and by that reservation of the right to use the water at any time, even all of it all the time, for the purposes of navigation, we reserve the right to utterly destroy the power purposes of any dam that might be constructed which did not exist in the present law, and I commend it to the attention of the gentleman. And, as I stated, a very notable instance exists in his own district.

Now, why was the change made? It was made because we want the dams built, because we want the waters utilized. When the plans are presented for approval to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers, remember that section 3 at once applies, that there shall be a comprehensive plan for the improvement of the waterway in question for the uses of navigation, for the full development of its water power, and other beneficial public purposes, and best adapted to conserve and utilize, in the interests of navigation and water-power development, the water resources of that region. So you notice that there are new obligations, not in the interest of capital but in the interests of the people, placed upon the applicants for this improvement.

What we design to accomplish is this, and the gentleman realizes that this arises in part from a controversy that we had previously over the river between our States—what we desired to accomplish was that the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers shall look over the whole stream; they shall ascertain whether this dam is for the best interests of the public in the use of that stream, and they shall ascertain as best they can how the waters of the stream shall be best conserved for all purposes, and whether this dam accomplishes that purpose.

Now, I do not believe it is difficult for the engineers to realize what ought to be done for many years in the future as to a stream after they have had that plan made under those circumstances, paid for by the applicant. Our own notion was—and in that we are reenforced by the judgment of the Secretary of War and of the Chief of Engineers—that it is not difficult whenever a plan is presented, whenever this comprehensive plan has been designed and made by the War Department, that they can tell within a reasonable certainty whether or not this lock ought to be placed and what ought to be its character.

Now, anybody who knows the Corps of Engineers well enough will realize that wherever there is any question at all, wherever there is any doubt at all, the engineers are bound to resolve that doubt in favor of navigation and require that dam to be installed. Now, we had no doubt that would cause the installation of more locks than would otherwise be constructed; that it would benefit navigation in that way far more than any other plan that could be designed. It will cost the applicants more for that reason. But there are many cases, and we have had cases come before this House and before the committee, where it would not be necessary to install a lock, especially in the small projects. In the large projects it is almost necessary in every instance to install the lock, and I have no question that in practically every large case that would be presented a lock would be required to be installed. But in the smaller cases, in the mountain streams, in the headwater development, there is no question that a lock is not necessary and never will be necessary. The result is that when a small dam owner, when the man who owns a site and who plans, perhaps, a $500,000 or $1,000,000 development, takes his plans to the Secretary of War, if the Secretary of War at the time informs him that a lock is necessary he knows just exactly what that lock will cost. And in the large proportion of cases, I think in most all of the cases, the lock will cost about one-half of the total expense of the dam. And where that is fixed in advance the applicant knows, and those who finance the enterprise will know, exactly what to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Then the applicant knows, then those who finance the project know, just exactly what the project will cost. There is no uncertainty about it. The result is that they can make up their minds then and say whether or not it is a proper thing to finance the project. If you leave the matter open, because of popular clamor, and it may arise, the War Department may be compelled, by this House or the other House, to compel the installation of a lock, and then, what would happen? The dam would cost from $500,000 to $1,000,000 in a small project. The dam would cost half of that. Remember the revenue of this project is fixed by public authority; that the consumers are paying on a certain scale; that the revenues are adjusted to meet the conditions of that project. Now, if you compel the additional expense of 25 or 50 per cent of the original expense any time the officials desire, that very uncertainty will prevent the financing of very many projects. That was one of the objections suggested, but our committee, to relieve the uncertainty at the beginning of the project, is laying down as a rule what ought to be done at the beginning. They have consulted the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers, and I know that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] heard the statement that the Secretary of War had confidence in his engineers that they could decide such a matter, and the engineers have told us that they could decide with reasonable certainty as to what ought to be done in the construction of a lock as to whether navigation would be improved.

Mr. LENROOT. Did not the chairman of the Board of Harbor Engineers say to the gentleman himself at a public hearing, at which I was present, that the engineers could not decide the question that was then up, and they could not for four or five years to come?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. He stated that the type of barge could not be told.

Mr. LENROOT. And therefore they could not decide on the type of lock?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. If they knew the size of the project, they could. And then, if the gentleman did not choose to build a lock, he need not. But it will be done, because the engineers will be compelled to require the maximum size in order to care for future contingencies. I can see no practical difficulty about that. As a result there will be more locks and better navigation facilities under this provision than there would be under the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to make a suggestion, right in that connection, as to the Secretary of War.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Very well.

Mr. ADAMSON. In addition to what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] stated, where he describes the conversation on my statement that the Secretary and the Chief of Engineers had all this information ready, I would state that the Chief of Engineers in an interview stated to me positively that whenever there was any doubt about the future necessity of a lock, they required it at the time, and would do so under this bill.

Mr. LENROOT. The Secretary proposed a bill to the gentleman's committee and made no proposition of that kind, but left the proposed bill as it now is.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is the Secretary of War's present proposition.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I assume the responsibility of giving the committee the reasons why such a change was made.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Referring to the colloquy between the gentlemen, I understand the gentleman from Minnesota to take the position that by leaving the word "then" in the act, instead of inserting the words "at that time"——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. "At any time."

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. "At any time"—he means that if in the erection of a dam this year it would not appear necessary for navigation to have a lock, but that if in 10 years from that time a lock should be put in, then the Government would have to bear that expense, and not the owners of the dam?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, no. The Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers could provide in the original approval the conditions under which a lock could be installed. That might be at any time in the future. But of course it would be cheaper and easier to install a lock at the beginning, even if it were not used for 20 years afterwards. In that case they would not have to tear out the work.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I understood the amendment proposed would simply put them upon notice and compel them to do that in the first contract?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Would not that better serve the interests of navigation?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; I believe it would injure navigation, and for this reason: Because more dams would be built under our plan than under the plan of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. More locks.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; more locks would be built. Under the plan proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin dams in doubtful places could not be built at all, because they could not be financed. Under our plan any place that needed a lock in a dam would have it in advance, even if it might not be used for 20 or 25 years afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, against the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] as to the power of the Board of Engineers to foresee the needs of the future I put the actual facts of the past. At my city is a falls that has necessitated the building of a canal. Probably no river in America has had more study than the Ohio River; probably no project has undergone as many changes touching the height of the dam, the character of the lock, its length and its width, as has the project at the city of Louisville.

Now, I state that for the information of this committee, because to my mind it is perfectly plain that it is impossible for engineers, no matter how skilled they are, to foresee the needs of the future. Those needs will be determined largely by the character of the commerce that develops on the stream. For instance, we are now building at Louisville a lock of the same width as the Panama lock and 600 feet long—the largest lock, nearly, in the country. That has come about through the need of being able to put a large number of coal barges through the lock at one time, without breaking them up and locking them individually, and particularly at a time when it is necessary to go down the river upon the crest of high water.

Now, to say that you can always foresee the development that may take place upon a river and that the United States must estop itself for 50 years or build at its own expense is to say something that I do not think appeals to the reason of the House.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] says that this is done for the sake of small streams at the headwaters, where there will never be need of a dam, and then in the next breath he tells you that he is fearful that these engineers who are to have the wisdom to see 50 years hence will be so weak that under the pressure of popular clamor they will order at some subsequent period a lock to be built that ought not to be built.

Now, he must stick by his witnesses. I do not believe there is any danger of Congress or the War Department putting upon any grantee any undue or onerous terms in connection with the building of locks that might be found necessary in the future. I do not fear that. You can not legislate except upon two premises. First, that your agent is going to be honest; and, second, that he is going to be intelligent. If your engineers are going to be both honest and intelligent, they are not going to burden a grantee with an undue and an unjustifiable burden. But here you are proposing to grant an unusually long franchise In my country a 50-year franchise is a very long franchise to give. We have been constantly shortening the franchises that we give to corporations of all sorts. Here you are proposing to close the door for a term of 50 years.

My only objection to the amendment offered is that I do not think it fully covers the point. I think the whole paragraph ought to be so written as to make it clear that at any time any aids to navigation may be placed in the river or in the stream, and that such part of the cost as may be determined, either the whole or a part, may be put upon the grantee. We are here undertaking to mortgage the future; and I, for one, protest against the closing of the door for 50 years.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that, if this amendment is adopted, I shall offer further amendments restoring the old law.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; for the amendment itself will not accomplish the whole purpose. I had roughly drafted here a section to take the place of the old one; but now upon this particular amendment we are faced with the principle, and this House ought to determine whether it is going to foreclose the matter for 50 years or whether it is going to leave it open to be adjusted as circumstances may determine.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What does the gentleman from Kentucky say as to the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] that, with the Lenroot amendment, capital could not be induced to engage where there was a possibility of an additional 50 per cent in the investment?

Mr. SHERLEY. In the first place, the cost of a lock may be 50 per cent of the dam cost, but it is not 50 per cent of the investment in the development of water power, and nothing like that much.

I say another thing. You can not here determine what water powers are going to be developed. That will change from year to year. Increased facility in the transportation of electric power, which has now reached the point in some instances where power is transmitted 300 miles; the increased efficiency of machinery in the development of hydroelectric power; the increased cost of other methods of developing power; the increased cost of coal may bring into the realm of practicability in the future projects that to-day are not practicable. Look back 50 years and see the changes that have taken place in engineering, in all the fields of industry and of science. Yet here to-day you are undertaking to determine for half a century the terms, and you agree that they must be very liberal so as to invite capital to invest. My experience has been that the trouble with a good many water-power proposals is that the men who undertook them and who got the original control of the sites were promoters rather than men engaged in the actual development of power.

Then there will come changes in the demand for power in different localities. All of these things will determine from time to time whether a particular power can be developed. And I submit again this proposition, that you have no right to assume that an engineer will put such burdens upon the grantee as will bankrupt him; and I do not believe that the men who invest capital in matters of this kind are so doubtful, so suspicious of their Government, as to make that a reason why they should not undertake these projects.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Is it not a common practice in this country, and has it not been for years, to impose burdens upon grantees, railroads, street car companies, and so forth, that were never dreamed of years ago?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; and though they said they would go bankrupt, they have continued to make profits.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I will detain the committee only a moment. I rise more for the purpose of obtaining information than to make any argument. I will say, however, that I do not agree with the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] that we are mortgaging the future, foreclosing our rights for the next 50 years in this matter. The proposition we make to the water-power company is simply this: "Here is a stream. If you will provide a lock and dam in it according to the specifications of our engineers that will serve the needs of navigation, we will permit you to do it. If the Government itself thought it was desirable, it would go on and build that lock and dam to-day to meet the needs of the navigation interests of to-day. If 25 years from now other conditions arise and it is necessary to have a different type of lock, the Government will then go in at its own expense and build another lock of another type."

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Not right now. The Government will then do what is necessary to develop the navigation facilities that are then required. Under this bill these companies are required to furnish the facilities that our engineers think are needed now or reasonably prospective. We certainly ought to have the right, and if it is not in the bill I think it ought to be there—the Government certainly ought to have the right to say to this company "You must restore the conditions of navigability, at least as good conditions as there were when you went in there."

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] said that is not in the bill. I then asked his attention to this paragraph, and he and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] both said it does not apply. If paragraph (d) on page 6 does not mean that, I can not see what else it does mean.

Paragraph (d), on page 6, provides—

(d) For the payment or securing the payment to the United States of such sums and in such manner as the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers may deem reasonable and just substantially to restore conditions upon such stream as to navigability as existing at the time of such approval, whenever the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers shall determine that navigation would be injured by reason of the construction, maintenance, and operation of such dam and its accessory works.

Now, I will ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] a question solely for information: If that does not mean that the Federal Government is reserving the right to require these people to restore the conditions of navigability existing at the time of such approval, what does it mean?

Mr. LENROOT. It could not mean that, because there could be only two ways of restoring it—one by taking out the dam, and the other by constructing the lock. The specific provision that we are discussing will, unless my amendment is adopted, be such that they will never have to construct a lock. Under the terms of the general bill itself they can not be compelled to remove the dam.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Suppose we give somebody the authority to construct a dam up here at Great Falls on the Potomac, and in the course of time the Government wants something done and it requires the owner of the dam to restore conditions of navigability which existed at the time the dam was constructed. Who would make anything out of it? There is no navigation there. There can not be any navigation there now. Of what avail is it to order a man to restore the conditions of navigability, or nonnavigability, which means the same thing?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I assume that under conditions of that sort no such ridiculous order would ever be issued. The Government would do nothing of the sort.

Mr. MANN. Then the Government can accomplish nothing under the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. At that point it could not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I suppose not there, and not at Niagara Falls; but suppose at some other place, where there are certain conditions of navigability now, that we propose to improve, and in the course of human events the engineers decide that the structures that are put in there by the grantee are actually a menace or hindrance or an obstruction to navigation instead of an aid. Then in that event we would have the right to tell these people "You must remove the obstructions and restore the conditions of navigability that did exist before." That would never occur at Great Falls of course, where there is no navigability.

Mr. MANN. Is it not almost universally the case that where you can construct a dam you have something in the way of falls or rapids where there is no navigation?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. That is frequently true.

Mr. MANN. That is usually the case.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do not know that it is usually the case.

Mr. MANN. I am acquainted with scarcely a place where that does not occur.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Take the 9-foot dams of the Ohio River; those are not dependent upon any falls or rapids. Very frequently we put locks and dams in a river where it is navigable for four or five months in the year.

Mr. MANN. Take the Keokuk Dam.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Take the instances I am citing, for they will do as well. There we put locks and dams in the river and make it navigable for 12 months without reference to whether there are falls or rapids or not. It helps the conditions of navigability; and if the conclusion is afterwards reached that that dam is an obstruction instead of an aid to navigation, it ought to be removed. Now, I am asking for information, and I will ask the gentleman to answer me first, What is this paragraph (d)?

Mr. LENROOT. Fortunately, I am not in a position where I am called upon to answer.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Then I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is put in for this purpose: Where the natural conditions exist and a change of commercial conditions arise, where it is necessary that the Government should have the improvement to navigation, it has a right under this to order conditions restored as they were before, practically, under the Chandler-Dunbar case, without the Government paying anything for it. It makes that case applicable to this act.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me ask the gentleman, Would it authorize the removal of the dam without paying anything for it?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; if Congress should order it removed.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The Secretary of War——

Mr. MANN. Take the Keokuk Dam, and here is a live illustration. The Government did have a lock there before. There was no navigability of the river, except in high water, except through the lock. By the construction of the dam that lock was destroyed and overflowed, and there was a new lock put in. Does this provision mean that if the Government chooses it can order this dam removed and restore this old, inadequate, practically useless lock, which was there before this dam was constructed? Because that would be restoring the conditions of navigability before the dam was constructed.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman's inquiry was addressed to the gentleman from Minnesota. I suppose that that might be the case, but I am not going to suppose that Congress or the Secretary of War would do any such ridiculous thing.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. My reason for making the request is that I drew the original dam law in 1906 and was chairman of the committee when the amendatory act of 1910 was enacted, although even at that time I preferred the original act to the amended act, but there were some outstanding obligations to President Roosevelt which caused the amendment.

The dam act has never had a fair show. We hear the statement constantly made that under the provisions of the original dam law capital will not be invested, that you can not finance the enterprise.

Now, the fact is that almost every enterprise that has been authorized by Congress, if not every one, since the passage of the original act in 1906 has been financed and constructed, notwithstanding the constant claim made that you can not obtain capital under the provisions of that act. Here is the Rainy River Dam at International Falls, one of the principal dams of the country, it might be said, which was constructed and financed and is now in operation under the provisions of that law.

In 1910, as I recall it—I do not remember whether before or after the amendatory act was passed—we passed a law or laws authorizing the construction of some dams down in South Carolina. I remember that was when the Taft administration was new. I think I was expected to be the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at that time, although the committee had not been appointed. A gentleman came here from South Carolina with pathos in his voice and hard-luck stories of all kinds and succeeded in getting everybody here agreeable to the passage of his bill or bills—I do not remember whether there was more than one, but I know there were several dams involved—and that bill passed without ever coming from a committee. I had forgotten the circumstance, but a few days ago I received a letter from this gentleman recalling the action when he was here and inviting me to visit the dam which had been constructed and by means of which power is now being generated. They were able to finance that project.

Now, why have not more enterprises been financed? Well, the first bill we passed, or the second, under the original dam law was vetoed by President Roosevelt on the ground that the law did not require the payment of compensation, or some ground like that. I insisted to the President, as I still believe, that under the terms of the original law the Government could impose such stipulations and conditions as it pleased for the approval of the dam. But when Mr. Roosevelt vetoed the bill on the ground he did, although he waived the objection as far as the Rainy River Dam was concerned, it still stood as to any other bill. What was the use of passing any more bills? Congress declined to pass any other bills until the matter was adjusted in some way so that when Congress had passed the act the President would approve it. When Mr. Taft came in as President he approved these acts that I speak of for the South Carolina dams.

But shortly after Taft went in there a dam bill went to him and he disapproved it and vetoed it. What was the use in Congress passing any more bills when the President had declared that he would veto them all? And he vetoed the Coosa River Dam bill, which did pass after a hot contest in both the House and the Senate. I do not think anyone can know whether financiers would advance the money under the provisions of the original law, because there has been no opportunity to do it which they have refused. It is natural and proper that promoters desire to get the best terms possible. It is natural that men who propose to invest money desire to get the best terms possible for their side of the case, and it ought to be natural that we, representing the whole people and standing for the Government itself, should, while dealing fairly with those who seek the special privileges, also guard the interests of the Government and the whole people.

We now have an amendatory act before us which has to be disposed of. I have not paid so much attention to the details of the bill that has been printed in a number of different forms. I have the highest regard for the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], the chairman of the committee; for the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], the ranking minority member on that committee; and for all the members of that committee, for which I also entertain, both in the way of memory and reality, an affectionate regard. I served on that committee so long that my prejudices are all with the committee.

A word now as to the pending amendment. The old law, the first act, and the amendatory act, provides that when the plans are presented to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers for approval, those two officials may impose such stipulations as they please. That is not the language. Here it is:

> Such conditions and stipulations may be imposed as the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War may deem necessary to protect the present and future interests of the United States.

I think that gives to those officials the power to impose such stipulations as they please, if in their opinion—and they are the judges of that—it should affect the present or future interests of the United States. And then specifically, so that there might be no lack of calling their attention to the matter when the act was originally drawn, it provided:

> Which [conditions and stipulations] may include the condition that such person shall construct, maintain, and operate, without expense to the United States, in connection with said dam and appurtenant works, a lock or locks, booms, sluices, or any other structures which the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers at any time may deem necessary in the interest of navigation, in accordance with such plans as they may approve.

In other words, when the original plan comes before the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers for approval they may include in their stipulations the condition that the owners of the dam shall construct locks, booms, sluices, or other structures which these officials may at any time think are necessary, and then in accordance with plans which they may approve.

The pending bill has entirely changed the theory of the original act. The original act authorized the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers to impose these conditions; treated the matter as though we had an actual case. Here is a river. There are rapids in the river, or there are falls in the river. You never have dams constructed where there is plenty of water at a particular place in the river. You have to have a fall of water, a decline, in order to make a dam of any use, and that must be either in the way of falls or rapids. There is no variation in the surface level of a stream unless there is a rapid run of the water, and you have to have a condition where there is practically no natural navigation except in high water, in order to construct a dam at all for the purpose of the production of power. But here is a case where the improvements on the river have not been determined. No one can tell whether there is need for a lock at that place at this time, but it is a great potent power for the manufacture of hydroelectric power, and the original act authorized the Chief of Engineers to impose the condition that if he should conclude, as the development of navigation progressed up that river, that in the course of time a lock was needed at that point, in order to go around the dam that was raised, then the owners of the dam should be required to construct that lock.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman wish more time?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Take the Keokuk Dam which has been referred to—a great dam. The Government did have a lock there and was contemplating the construction of a new lock. But suppose there had been no lock there at all, and Congress had granted the authority to build a dam, and the engineers had not yet arrived at a definite conclusion as to what kind of lock was required. They could impose, under the original act, the condition that at any time the owners of the dam should be required to construct a lock to get around the dam upon plans which they should then approve. These locks that are required are required to get around a dam that the owners of the dam build. That looks like a fair proposition. I can not say that it was onerous upon the proposed owners of the dam. If we had said that the owner of the dam here should be required to build a lock out yonder in the prairie, that would be imposing onerous and unfair conditions; but when we reserve the right only to require the owner of the dam to construct a necessary lock to go up and down around the dam which he built, that is no onerous condition. And as you necessarily go into just what was wanted at the time in many cases, the right was reserved at any time to fix the matter. But the pending bill removes that entirely. The pending bill requires that the Secretary of War must determine when he approves the plans for the dam exactly what other structures are to be built. If the Secretary of War or the Chief of Engineers has not made up his mind as to what lock is necessary, then he refuses to approve the dam.

I can not see how that will be any advantage for men who wish to promote these enterprises. In many cases the Chief of Engineers will not have determined what necessary structures ought to be there in order to permit the passing up and down of the river around the dam; and if he is not, he can not approve these plans; or if he does approve them, he must waive the right to ever require these structures to be built, because the present bill reads:

> Which the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers or Congress then may deem necessary in the interest of navigation, in accordance with plans made a part of such approval.

And such approval is the approval of the plans for the dam. In other words, under the pending bill the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers must either waive all right on behalf of the Government or he must be prepared, when they approve the plans for the dam, to determine exactly just what locks, dams, sluices, or other structures are required in order to pass around the dam; and nine times out of ten they will not have done that, because in most of these places where the dams are to be built the War Department has not yet reached a conclusion as to what is necessary at these particular points for the interest of navigation. They improve navigable rivers in many places, but not so much in those places where they have rapids, unless they have already undertaken the work there, and where they have already undertaken the work there this bill is of little importance.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield to me.

Mr. MANN. I promised to yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] if he desires to ask me a question.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not care to disturb the gentleman's argument, but as I understood from the gentleman from Illinois the material difference between the present amendment and his old provision is that in the approving of plans under the old law the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers may require the company in the future to comply with any condition in reference to navigation if they find it necessary.

Mr. MANN. Under the old law it leaves the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War the authority to determine hereafter what structures are necessary in order to pass around the dam. Under this law they have to determine at the time of the approval of the plans for the dam or else waive the right entirely.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, what does the gentleman think of the last sentence in the old section imposing authority, that if the Government concludes to build the locks it shall require title to be conveyed and power granted?

Mr. MANN. There may be cases where the Secretary of War does not choose to require the dam companies to build the locks. But in every case they will be required, at least, to furnish the title to the land. There may be and I doubt not there are many places where it would be unfair to require the builders of the dam to construct the locks, but at least they will be required to furnish the land, but the Secretary of War has authority to prescribe the building of the locks.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then the gentleman's position is that under the original section the Secretary of War did have discretion to require or not require at the time?

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will not the result of forcing the Government engineers to determine in advance what they want then be that primarily they will make requirements that would not be necessary, and so place a burden upon the grantee, and in that way it is not in the interest of the grantee?

Mr. MANN. I would not be surprised if they were, because they must do something without sufficient knowledge or refuse to do it, one of the two. Now I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I just want to make this statement: The gentleman and myself have made opposite statements, or, rather, contradictory statements, and the fact is this——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I ask that the gentleman may have a minute longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed for a minute.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois conclude his remarks.

Mr. MANN. I do not wish that much time. I ask the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Somebody else would like to hear more about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the gentleman may conclude his remarks.

Mr. MANN. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that request.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Very well; I will withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Illinois proceeding for five minutes? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What I want to call the gentleman's attention to is this: I have been asked if it was not true that locks and dams are always built in rivers where there are falls or rapids. I answered that question, I think accurately, that that is not the case and I do not think that that is usually the case. Where a dam is constructed for the purpose of developing water power it is most likely—I do not know, but it might be universally constructed where there are falls or rapids, but if locks and dams are built for the purpose of navigation throughout the country I do not think the gentleman's statement is accurate.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well; I was talking about this bill. I did not mean to be understood as saying they never built a dam in flat water. Of course they can build a dam in any water; you can build a dam in the sea if you want to do so; but what has that got to do with the bill we have now before us, which is authorizing the construction of dams to generate electric power?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I was answering the gentleman's question——

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman was discussing this bill; if he was not——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I thought I was answering the gentleman, and I still think I answered him. Now, I would like to get the gentleman's opinion, and I am asking for information; I have asked several Members, and nobody could answer anything more than what the gentleman has just said. That is, as to what paragraph (d) on page 6 means. The only information I have received on the subject is that it did not mean what I thought it did.

Mr. MANN. I suppose it means what it says, but, as the Lord only knows, there are many things that creep up here that are not intended to mean what they say. But I do not think it is so difficult to understand. It says:

> For payment or securing the payment to the United States of such sums and in such manner as the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers may deem reasonable and just substantially to restore conditions upon such stream as to navigability, as existing at the time of such approval, whenever the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers shall determine that navigation would be injured by reason of the construction, maintenance, and operation of such dam and its accessory works.

There may be cases where the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers might desire to restore conditions as they existed at the time. I can not imagine any other meaning, and I think the bill would be just as well off without it as it is with it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, no. It is in the original bill that the gentleman drew.

Mr. MANN. It is not.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. If it is, it is all right.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The provision is in the old law that the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers can require at any time any obstruction to navigation to be removed.

Mr. MANN. Oh, certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. That is what this means, exactly. This is a requirement that any obstruction to navigation that was put in by the grantee can be removed.

Mr. MANN. If that is the case, it is better to leave it as it is in the existing law, which is plain, and which my friend from Mississippi understands may require obstructions to navigation to be removed, whereas he says he does not understand what this provision means.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I said it meant that obstructions to navigation could be removed. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] both said that it does not.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman may not have understood my question, or I may have been unhappy in putting it. That is the thought I had in my mind. That is the question I was trying to ask at the time, because the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] had stated that we at least ought to have a right to require the grantee to restore conditions as to navigability as they were when the contract was originally made; and then I asked if this did not do that, and both of the gentlemen answered no.

Mr. MANN. I never found any value in disputing with any gentleman over what he meant if you could arrive at a conclusion of what he means now. So I do not think that is important. We were discussing the other question, as to the right of the Secretary of War to retain the control and require locks or dams to be constructed in the future. The gentleman from Mississippi undertook to state, as I understood him, that this section (d) covered that. I respectfully then, and respectfully now, deny it, because section (d) only authorizes the removal of the obstruction to navigation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the gentleman yield? I understood the gentleman to say that if the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers at the time of the original approval of the plan did not require the construction of a lock they waived all such rights; but is there not a very important and large reservation of rights that immediately follows there:

> Whenever Congress shall deem such facilities necessary, the persons owning such dam shall convey to the United States, free of cost, title to such land as may be required for such constructions and approaches, and shall grant to the United States free water power or power generated from water power for building, lighting, and operating such constructions.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will notice that this is one of the conditions imposed by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers as a condition for approving the plans.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Without the requirement of a lock or canal?

Mr. MANN. You can not build a dam without their approval. They can reserve these conditions, but it is within their discretion to do it. I take it they have already reserved it so far. If they do not reserve them, the conditions do not exist.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the reason for this amendment is based upon the idea that the Chief of Engineers will not be capable, when passing upon the plans and requirements of a dam or a system of dams in a stream, to state in advance just what facilities may be needed in the future for the purposes of navigation. Now, if I agreed with him as to that, or if I agreed with that idea, I should myself favor the amendment, because I believe we should leave nothing unsaid in this bill to make certain that it will operate in the interests of the people of the country, for what will be to their interest will likewise be to the interest of those who will develop the power. But while it may be true that in some instances the Chief of Engineers may be unable to state just what the future needs of a stream may be, those cases, in my opinion, will be rare, and in a large majority of instances he will be able to determine approximately in advance what facilities will be needed in the future, at least during the limit of years fixed in this bill. That might not have been easy in some instances 30 or 40 years ago, but the engineers know more, perhaps, now of the needs of our waterways than they did then. And I want to say, in response to a remark made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] a while ago when he instanced some of the locks and dams on the Ohio River as bearing out his idea that the engineers could not look far into the future, that even 20 or 25 years ago they were contending that those locks should be larger than they were being constructed, larger than the plans for them required.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say to the gentleman, as he knows, that the plan for the Ohio River has been adopted within the last few years—less than 10. There is now a project looking to a complete change in that plan by the elimination of one dam and lock and the increase of the height of the dam at Louisville by several feet, and a year has not gone by that there has not been some fundamental change proposed by the engineers—not one year.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Possibly not so fundamental as the gentleman might suppose. But it is a fact, Mr. Chairman, that 20 or 25 years ago some of our engineers were contending that the locks as planned for the Ohio River were not sufficient; that larger and deeper locks were needed; and that a 9-foot low-water depth from Pittsburgh to Cairo should be provided. It has only been within recent years, to be sure, that that plan has been adopted. At first we worked upon a 7-foot channel, but finally—in 1907, I believe—embarked upon the 9-foot plan, with locks to accommodate such a channel and the water craft that might be expected to use the channel. The only material consideration was the dimensions of the locks, and these have been, in the main, long since determined.

Looking over the field and having given this matter such thought as I am capable of, I have reached the conclusion that our commercial needs will not demand any greatly increased depth in many of our rivers. Indeed, if the ideas now being expressed by some periodicals and by a few of our statesmen are to be taken as correct, commerce is dwindling and rapidly disappearing on the rivers of our country, so that in a few years we will not need any kind of improvement or transportation facilities. This is an erroneous impression, for it is growing on nearly all our rivers.

But let me tell you the trouble is not with the rivers, but with the harbors, when you come to arrange plans for the future. When the last river and harbor bill was under consideration in the House I undertook to forecast the future as to expenditures for river and harbor improvements for the next 25 years and believe I did not overstate the figures, which I fixed at $450,000,000, including the projects adopted in that and preceding bills and not completed. The trouble when you seek to look into the future is not with the rivers, although now and then the engineers might make a mistake. Such mistakes would be negligible. The trouble is with the harbors, where they must plan for the accommodation of the ever-increasing draft of vessels.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Now, I am inclined to believe that a low-water depth of 7 feet in our rivers will in most cases be sufficient. Some, of course, as the Ohio and the lower Mississippi, will require more; and I say it is possible even now for a competent engineer—and our Government engineers are competent—after having studied a proposed project, to determine just what will be needed to meet commercial demands for a long period of years. I think, for instance, he can, after looking over a stream, after studying and considering the resources of the stream, studying the needs of the future and the possibilities of the country contributing to such stream, determine quite accurately its future commercial needs, and plan accordingly without any great liability to err. If I did not believe that, Mr. Chairman, I should certainly favor the amendment which the gentleman has offered.

I have said that the main trouble in any effort to predict as to future commercial needs when outlining plans for the improvement of our waterways is mainly with the harbors and not with the rivers. There is perhaps not a navigable stream in the country, or one capable of being made navigable by canalization or otherwise, that has not been studied by the engineers, nor one with which they are not thoroughly familiar. So that it is easy for them now to lay down plans to meet the requirements of navigation on any stream for many years to come; or, at least, it is easy for anyone who has been so long in the service and become so skillful in his profession as to be placed in the responsible position of Chief of Engineers. That fact is recognized by some, at least, who have given serious thought to the subject of waterway development. There has been for many years an insistent demand for a comprehensive system of improvement of our rivers under which channels not only may be standardized as to depth, but may be put in a condition to meet all future demands or, at least, the requirements of commerce for a long period of years. This demand is even now in a fair way to be met, as every plan for the improvement of our rivers is being made with reference to the distant future as well as the present. So that when a project now proposed for a given improvement in any navigable stream is completed it will likely be in a condition to meet all reasonable requirements for many years to come, as it is not expected the draft of freight-carrying boats for use on our rivers will greatly increase beyond what it is to-day.

The future freight-carrying boat for river use will be of the barge type, either self-propelled or moved by a towboat, and there is little need for greater than 7 feet for the accommodation of such craft. Certainly 9 feet will at all times be ample. This is proven by the class of traffic on the waterways of Europe, where they are compelled to accommodate themselves to shallow channels. Traffic on the Rhine, for instance, the greatest freight-carrying river of Europe, is moved in the main on less than 9 feet of water.

In some rivers, as the Hudson and the lower reaches of the Mississippi, large and deeper draft vessels will no doubt be used, as they are being used now, but the greater part of the freight traffic on all of our navigable streams will be carried in barges of perhaps not more than 7-feet draft, certainly not more than 9. So that even now, as I have just said, it will be easy for an engineer to determine the necessary dimensions of a lock for use during the next 50 years.

The trouble in predicting arises when you come to deal with harbors, for it is difficult to tell just now what the size and draft of the boat of the future will be. Still, I think that is entirely possible, at least within reasonable limits. I believe it is now practicable for the engineers, in devising plans for present and future needs, to determine what facilities will be needed for our coastwise and foreign commerce, at least for a quarter of a century, perhaps for half a century, and I have heretofore suggested that the engineers, in making surveys and recommending new projects for our harbors, should plan for at least 25 or 30 years, for by that means we would materially lessen the cost of such improvements. Heretofore this has been done in few if any cases, as the engineers have, in recommending plans, felt themselves limited by the prevalent, though in many instances commendable, desire for economy, or at least for conservatism in the matter of expenditures. This is a false idea of economy when applied to our harbors and rivers and should not be followed in any case where it is possible by wise and well-considered plans to get away from it. If the engineers were permitted, in making surveys and reporting projects, to plan for long periods of years, so that work now being done by piecemeal and with short rests, could all be done at once, or in the carrying out of one project much money would be saved in making required improvements and better commercial results obtained.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will only add that we can enter upon no more important undertaking than the improvement of our rivers and harbors for the purposes of navigation, and I favor this measure because it will aid much in this great work.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ADAMSON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The Committee divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, on page 3, all of line 2 after the word "with," on lines 3 and 4, and the words "approval and construction," on line 5, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "such plans as they may approve, and also that."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, that amendment applies to the old bill. If the Clerk will change that, to refer to the new committee print, it will be all right.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Let us understand where it comes in.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, on page 3, all of line 2 after the word "with"——

Mr. MURDOCK. There is not any word "with" in there.

Mr. LENROOT. After the word "with," in line 4 of the new committee print, down to and including the word "construction," on line 7.

Mr. FERRIS. What is that amendment, Mr. Chairman? Will the gentleman state it again?

Mr. ADAMSON. Let the gentleman from Wisconsin state the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. The amendment will strike out the words "plan made a part of such approval."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "with," on line 4, and lines 5 and 6 and the words "approval and construction" in line 7.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, may I call the attention of the Clerk to the fact that there are three copies of this bill—an original bill, and then a bill with amendments, and then a new committee print?

Mr. ADAMSON. There is only one copy before the House, by unanimous consent, and I have furnished the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] with that this morning.

Mr. MURDOCK. The amendment as cited there does not fit with the language.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is the fault of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has read the amendment as it was given to him.

Mr. LENROOT. It is correct now.

Mr. ADAMSON. I did not understand it. Let the gentleman from Wisconsin read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, on page 3, all of line 4.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; that is all wrong.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "with," in line 4, and lines 5 and 6.

Mr. ADAMSON. And line 7.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the words "approval and construction" in line 7.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is correct.

The Clerk read as follows:

And insert in lieu thereof the following: "such plan as they may approve, and also that."

Mr. LENROOT. Now, Mr. Chairman, this merely restores the old law, so as to harmonize the amendment just adopted.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I shall not resist that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the proviso in the committee amendment. It now becomes unnecessary.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] can tell about that. I myself never did think it was necessary.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 16, by striking out the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] state more accurately just what is intended to be stricken out?

Mr. LENROOT. All of the proviso, beginning with line 16, covering the balance of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, by striking out all of the proviso, beginning with line 16 and ending with line 25.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. One more amendment, Mr. Chairman. I move, in line 13, page 3, to strike out the words "in such original approval."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 13, by striking out the words "in such original approval."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, page 3, line 12, by adding a comma after the word "building," and inserting the word "lighting."

The CHAIRMAN. On what line?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Line 12.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, by inserting after the word "building," in line 12, a comma and the word "lighting."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, we thought the word "operating" included the word "lighting." I do not think this is necessary. You certainly can not operate it without lighting it.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I disagree with the gentleman from Georgia. The lighting does not enter into the operation. They ought to furnish power for lighting as well as for operating.

Mr. ADAMSON. I tried to intimate to the gentleman that adding that redundant word does not meet any powerful resistance on my part. But you can not operate one of these plants without lighting it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. If the gentleman will examine page 7, lines 13, 14, 15, and 16, he will notice the language is:

Such regulations may include the maintenance and operation by such grantee, at its own expense, of such lights and other signals as may be directed by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers—

And so forth.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Then, Mr. Chairman, the adoption of my amendment will bring this in harmony with what the gentleman from Minnesota has just called attention to.

Mr. MANN. I doubt very much, Mr. Chairman, the desirability of this amendment. This relates to the practical operation of the lock, and the law now provides that the owner of the dam shall furnish power for the operation of the lock. If you insert the word "lighting," it would not refer to anything except the operation of the lock. It would not relate to the furnishing of lights in the Government building, or anything of that kind. Now, if lights are necessary for the operation of the lock, that is included. If you specify a particular thing, you may exclude other things that may be required. Where you become specific you have either got to follow along and keep specific or else your general language becomes of no advantage.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In other words, the gentleman from Illinois thinks there may be other elements essential to the operation?

Mr. MANN. There might be many other elements besides the mere moving of the lock up and down.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And the mere lighting.

Mr. MANN. And the mere lighting.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And if you begin to be specific, you may exclude other things.

Mr. MANN. The general rule of law is that when you become specific and then use general language the general language may not include similar things to the one where you have been specific.

Mr. ADAMSON. The expression of one will exclude many others.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Kentucky will excuse the Chair for a moment, the Chair should have recognized the gentleman from Illinois, who had another amendment, which may have referred to the same subject.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, my amendment does not refer to the same subject, and I am willing to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, by adding at the end of the section, in line 16, the following: "The Secretary of War may provide as a condition of such approval for the payment to the United States of reasonable annual charges for the benefits that accrue to the grantee by the authority given under this act, and at the end of 20 years, and every 10 years thereafter, the Secretary of War may readjust the annual charges as may then be just and reasonable."

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to be heard on that, Mr. Chairman. This section provides for the conditions that may be imposed before approval is given to any grantee to construct a dam on navigable waters. My amendment provides for one of these conditions—annual payment, when it shall be just and reasonable. If that is not in order here, I do not know what on earth can be in order.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, it is not in order on this bill. It raises the general question both of lack of authority to make this provision in this way, and, even if it be constitutional, that it should not be done in this measure. I do not make the point particularly that it is not in order at this particular place in the bill, although I think it would be better in some other place; but I make the point of order that it is not germane to this bill, either here or in any other part of the bill. I am ready to discuss that question of germaneness.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to hear the gentleman's point of order. I can not conceive what it is.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I did not catch quite all of the gentleman's amendment, but I understand that the Secretary of War may include a charge as a condition of his approval. That is the substance of the amendment as I understood it. Mr. Chairman, I maintain that is not germane for the reason that it is an exercise of the taxing power of the United States, or an attempted exercise, as a part of a bill which is using the commerce power of the United States. I maintain that the raising of a tax under the taxing power is not germane to a measure which only concerns the exercise of the commerce clause in regulating navigation. That is the substance of my point; but, even if Congress can so tax, this amendment does not provide for such uniformity as the Constitution requires.

The amendment attempts to make a charge to raise revenue for general purposes of the United States, and that can not be done under this bill when objection is made that it is not germane. The basis of that contention is that there is nothing in the amendment which makes it relate directly to the purpose of commerce; that it is not a necessary part of the regulation of commerce; but, on the contrary, that it is a necessary part of a purpose and plan to raise money for the general public purposes to replenish the Treasury of the United States.

Now, the general legal proposition is that the United States has no legal property right in the flowing waters of navigable rivers, but that the legal title and right to these waters is in the State in trust for the public. I think there can be no contradiction as to this point in the decisions of either State or National courts on that subject. The only right that the United States has is the paramount right to use the water for navigation under the commerce clause, and anything which concerns the right or which relates to that right to use that water for the purposes of navigation can be included in this bill. I herewith submit a report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate on this subject, and will append it as a part of this argument.

The report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. —, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

POWER OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT OVER THE DEVELOPMENT AND USE OF WATER POWER.

Mr. NELSON, from the subcommittee of the Committe on the Judiciary, submitted the following report, to accompany S. Res. 44.

To the Committe on the Judiciary:

Your subcommittee which was directed to report on the following resolution—

"Resolved, That the Committe on the Judiciary of the Senate be, and it is hereby, directed to report to the Senate, at as early a date as possible in the next regular session of Congress, upon the power and authority of the National Government over the development and use of water power within the respective States, and especially:

"First. Has the National Government any authority to impose a charge for the use of water power developed on nonnavigable streams, whether State or interstate?

"Second. Has it any authority in granting permits to develop water power on a navigable stream to impose and enforce conditions relating to stated payments to the Government, regulation of charges to consumers, and determination of the right to make use of such developed power?

"Third. Has it authority in disposing of any of its lands, reserved or unreserved, necessary and suitable for use in connection with the development or use of water power on a nonnavigable stream, whether State or interstate, by lease or otherwise, to limit the time for which such development may continue, or to impose and enforce charges for the use and development of such water power, or to control and regulate the disposition of such water power to its consumers?"

have considered the same and reports as follows:

The interrogatories embraced in the foregoing resolution involve the rights of riparian owners, the rights of the States, and the rights of the Federal Government in the navigable and nonnavigable streams and watercourses of the country. A solution and understanding of these several rights will tend to answer and solve the questions propounded.

NAVIGABLE STREAMS.

The rule of the common law, that only those streams are held navigable in which the tide ebbs and flows, and only so far as such ebb and flow, has not been adopted and does not prevail in this country. With us the question of navigability is one of fact in each case. If a stream can be used for commerce or trade, in any form, to any substantial extent, even for the floating of rafts of logs or lumber, it is held to be a navigable stream. (The Genessee Chief, 12 How., 443; the Daniel Ball, 10 Wall., 557; the Montello, 20 Wall., 430; Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S., 324; Waterpower Co. v. Water Commissioners, 168 U. S., 349.)

Most of our streams and watercourses are, in fact, more or less navigable in some of their reaches, and the nonnavigable portions serve as a feeder for, and are so connected with, the navigable sections that it is difficult and scarcely practicable to apply a separate rule for each. This must needs be so where ample regulation of the navigable section can only be secured through regulation of the nonnavigable section. In such cases, for the purposes of interstate commerce, the Federal Government has full regulative power over the entire stream, the nonnavigable as well as the navigable sections.

In U. S. v. Rio Grande Irrigation Co. (174 U. S., 690) the Supreme Court, in passing upon certain statutes relating to the use of water for mining and irrigation purposes, makes this declaration:

"To hold that Congress, by these acts, meant to confer upon any State the right to appropriate all the waters of the tributary streams which unite into a navigable watercourse, and so destroy the navigability of that watercourse in derogation of the interests of all the people of the United States, is a construction which can not be tolerated. It ignores the spirit of the legislation and carries the statute to the verge of the letter and far beyond what under the circumstances of the case must be held to have been the intent of Congress" (pp. 706, 707).

TITLE OF THE STATES IN THE BEDS AND WATERS OF NAVIGABLE STREAMS.

The several States of the Union are each primarily the proprietors of, and have the sovereignty over, the beds and waters of the navigable streams and watercourses within their respective borders, subject only to the rights of the Federal Government under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution (par. 3, sec. 8, art. 1), and to the rights of the Federal Government as owner of the riparian lands (par. 2, sec. 3, art 4), which rights will hereafter be referred to and enlarged upon.

In the case of Martin v. Waddell (16 Peters, 367), where the question of tidelands and tidewaters was involved, the Supreme Court of the United States makes this clear and comprehensive declaration:

"For when the Revolution took place the people of each State became themselves sovereign; and in that character hold the absolute right to all their navigable waters, and the soils under them, for their own common use, subject only to the rights since surrendered by the Constitution to the General Government."

The same doctrine was laid down by the court in the case of Pollard v. Hagan (3 How., 212), and it was held to apply to the newer States in as full a measure as to the original States of the Union. In this case the court concludes its opinion as follows:

"By the preceding course of reasoning we have arrived at these general conclusions: First. The shores of navigable waters and the soils under them were not granted by the Constitution to the United States, but were reserved to the States respectively. Second. The new States have the same rights, sovereignty, and jurisdiction over this subject as the original States. Third. The right of the United States to the public land and the power of Congress to make all needful rules and regulations for the sale and disposition thereof conferred no power to grant to the plaintiffs the land (tidewater land) in controversy."

In the case of Barney v. Keokuk (94 U. S., 324), Justice Bradley declares that the correct principles were laid down in the foregoing cases, and then adds:

"These cases related to tidewater, it is true, but they enunciate principles which are equally applicable to all navigable waters."

The rule laid down in the foregoing cases is reaffirmed and amplified with the citation of numerous authorities in the case of Shively v. Bowlby (152 U. S., 1).

RIPARIAN TITLE.

It is the rule of the common law that a grant of land upon the borders of a navigable stream carries the grant only to the high-water line, while a grant of land bordering upon a nonnavigable stream carries the title to the center of the stream, subject to the public easement in the water of the stream. While this is the rule of the common law, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Hardin v. Jordan (140 U. S., 371), has determined that the limits and extent of the riparian ownership is governed by the law of the State in which the land is situated. Justice Bradley, who delivered the opinion in this case, after discussing the question and citing numerous authorities, concludes as follows:

"We do not think it necessary to discuss this point further. In our judgment the grants of the Government for lands bounded on streams and other waters, without any reservation or restriction of terms, are to be construed as to their effect according to the law of the State in which the lands lie" (p. 384).

The case of Shively v. Bowlby, heretofore cited, approves of and adheres to this rule, and the following cases indorse and adhere to the rule: Barney v. Keokuk (94 U. S., 324), St. Louis v. Myers (113 U. S., 566), Packer v. Bird (137 U. S., 661), St. Louis v. Rutz (138 U. S., 226), Mitchell v. Smale (140 U. S., 406), Grand Rapids v. Butler (159 U. S., 87), Water Power Co. v. Water Commissioners (168 U. S., 349), Kean v. Calumet Canal Co. (190 U. S., 452), United States v. Chandler Dunbar Co. (209 U. S., 447).

The rule of riparian ownership as to grants of land bordering on streams is diverse in the various States. Some States hold that the grant extends only to high-water mark; other States hold that it extends to low-water mark; while another class of States—and perhaps the most numerous—hold that the grant extends to the middle of the stream, subject to the public easement in the water of the stream. But whatever may be the law in this respect as to the effect of the grant, it only relates to the proprietorship in the banks and bed of the stream, and not to the ownership of the water in the stream.

In those States which hold that the title of the riparian owner only extends to the high or low water mark the title to the bed of the stream is deemed to be in the State, and whether the title to the bed of the stream is in the riparian owner or in the State, in either case the sovereignty over and the paramount title to the water of the stream is deemed to be in the State, but it holds it not absolutely, but in trust for all lawful public uses, and in subrogation to the rights of the Federal Government.

PROPRIETORSHIP AND CONTROL OF THE WATER IN STREAMS.

While the riparian proprietor may be the absolute owner of the bed of the stream, he has no such proprietorship in the water of the stream. The water is a movable thing, and as to that he has only a usufruct. His rights in the water are subject to the sovereignty and control of the State, to the rights of the other riparian owners, and to the public easement or use. Lord Chief Justice Hale in his De Juris Maris (Hargrave, p. 6), in the quaint law language of those days, states:

"Though fresh rivers are in point of propriety, as before, prima facie of a private interest; yet, as well fresh rivers as salt, or such as flow and reflow, may be under these two servitudes, or affected with them—viz, one of the prerogatives belonging to the King, and another public interest, or belonging to the people in general."

Commenting on a case in which the riparian owner claimed the title up to the thread of the stream in the Severn River as against the King, Lord Hale says (Hargrave, p. 36):

"But though the subject may thus have the propriety of a navigable river part of a port, yet these cautions are to be added, viz: First, that the King has yet a right of empire or government over it in reference to the safety of the kingdom and to his customs, it being a member of a port, prout infertius dicitur; second, that the people have a public interest, a jus publicum, of passage and repassage with their goods by water and must not be obstructed by nuisances or impeached by exactions. * * *. For the jus privatum of the owner or proprietor is charged with and subject to that jus publicum which belongs to the King's subjects; as the foil of an highway is, which though in point of property it may be a private man's freehold, yet it is charged with a public interest of the people, which may not be prejudiced or damnified."

Sir J. Leach, vice chancellor, in the case of Wright v. Howard (1 Simons & Stuart's Reports, 203), an English case in chancery, decided in 1823, explains the right of a riparian as follows:

"The right to the use of the water rests on clear and settled principles. Prima facie, the proprietor of each bank of a stream (not tidal) is the proprietor of half the land covered by the stream, but there is no property in the water. Every proprietor has an equal right to use the water which flows in the stream, and, consequently, no proprietor can have the right to use the water to the prejudice of any other proprietor. Without the consent of the other proprietors, who may be affected by his operations, no proprietor can either diminish the quantity of water, which would otherwise descend to the proprietors below, nor throw the water back upon the proprietors above."

Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, states the common-law rule in these words:

"Every proprietor of lands on the banks of a river has, naturally, an equal right to the use of the water which flows in the stream adjacent to his lands, as it was wont to run (currere solebat), without diminution or alteration. No proprietor has the right to use the water to the prejudice of other proprietors above or below him unless he has a prior right to divert it or a title to some exclusive enjoyment. He has no property in the water itself, but a simple usufruct while it passes along. Aqua currit et debet currere ut currere solebat is the language of the law. Though he may use the water while it runs over his land as an incident to the land, he can not unreasonably detain it or give it another direction, and he must return it to its ordinary channel when it leaves his estate." (3 Com., 439.) (Stein v. Burden, 29 Ala., 127.)

In the case of Head v. Amoskeag (113 U. S., 9), involving the right of the riparian owner to construct and maintain a milldam on his own land under a statute of New Hampshire, Justice Gray, who delivered the opinion of the court, declares:

"We prefer to rest the decision of this case upon the ground that such a statute, considered as regulating the manner in which the rights of proprietors of lands adjacent to a stream may be asserted and enjoyed, with a due regard to the interests of all, and to the public good, is within the constitutional power of the legislature" (p. 21).

He further declares:

"The right to the use of running water is publici juris, and common to all the proprietors of the bed and banks of the stream from its source to its outlet. Each has a right to the reasonable use of the water as it flows past his land, not interfering with a like reasonable use by those above or below him" (p. 23).

In the case of the United States v. Rio Grande Co. (174 U. S., 690), in considering a nonnavigable reach of the Rio Grande River, in the Territory of New Mexico, Justice Brewer, who delivered the opinion of the court, after quoting the foregoing paragraph from Chancellor Kent, adds:

"While this is undoubted, and the rule obtains in those States in the Union which have simply adopted the common law, it is also true that as to every stream within its dominion a State may change this common-law rule and permit the appropriation of the flowing waters for such purposes as it deems wise."

That the sovereignty and control over, and paramount title to, the waters in a stream is in the State is further established by that line of decisions sustaining the rule of public ownership and "prior appropriation" prevailing in the mining and semiarid States, and acquiescing in its application to the lands of the United States. (Jennison v. Kirk, 98 U. S., 45; Broder v. Water Co., 101 U. S., 274; Gutiers v. Albuquerque Co., 188 U. S., 545; Boquilla Cattle Co. v. Curtis, 213 U. S., 339.)

The case of Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 46) was a controversy between two States, one recognizing the doctrine of public ownership and prior appropriation and the other the common-law rule. Chief Justice Shaw, in the case of Elliott v. Fitchburg Railway Co. (10 Cush., 191), describes the rights of the riparian owner under the common-law rule in the following terms:

"The right to flowing water is now well settled to be a right incident to property in the land; it is a right publici juris, of such a character that, while it is common and equal to all through whose land it runs, and no one can obstruct or divert it, yet, as one of the beneficial gifts of Providence, each proprietor has a right to a just and reasonable use of it as it passes through his land; and so long as it is not wholly obstructed or diverted, or no larger appropriation of the water running through it is made than a just and reasonable use, it can not be said to be wrongful or injurious to a proprietor lower down. What is such a just and reasonable use may often be a difficult question, depending upon various circumstances. To take a quantity of water from a large running stream for agricultural or manufacturing purposes would cause no sensible or practicable diminution of the benefit to the prejudice of a lower proprietor, whereas taking the same quantity from a small running brook passing through many farms would be of great and manifest injury to those below who need it for dometic supply or watering cattle, and therefore it would be an unreasonable use of the water, and an action would lie in the latter case and not in the former. It is therefore to a considerable extent a question of degree; still the rule is the same, that each proprietor has a right to a reasonable use of it, for his own benefit, for domestic use, and for manufacturing and agricultural purposes. * * *

"That a portion of the water of a stream may be used for the purpose of irrigating land we think is well established as one of the rights of the proprietors of the soil along or through which it passes. Yet a proprietor can not under color of that right or for the actual purpose of irrigating his own land wholly abstract or divert the watercourse or take such an unreasonable quantity of water or make such unreasonable use of it as to deprive other proprietors of the substantial benefits which they might derive from it if not diverted or used unreasonably. * * *

"This rule, that no riparian proprietor can wholly abstract or divert a watercourse, by which it would cease to be a running stream, or use it unreasonably in its passage and thereby deprive a lower proprietor of a quality of his property, deemed in law incidental and beneficial, necessarily flows from the principle that the right to the reasonable and beneficial use of a running stream is common to all the riparian proprietors, and so each is bound to use his common right as not essentially to prevent or interfere with an equally beneficial enjoyment of the common right by all the proprietors. * * *

"The right to the use of flowing water is publici juris and common to all the riparian proprietors; it is not an absolute and exclusive right to all the water flowing past their land, so that any obstruction would give a cause of action; but it is a right to the flow and enjoyment of the water, subject to a similar right in all the proprietors to the reasonable enjoyment of the same gift of Providence. It is, therefore, only for an abstraction and deprivation of this common benefit or for an unreasonable and unauthorized use of it that an action will lie."

The assertion of public ownership and of prior appropriation, already referred to, is thus described by Justice Field in the case of Jennison v. Kirk (98 U. S., 453). After describing the system of discovery and appropriation and development of mining claims he adds the following:

"But the mines could not be worked without water. Without water the gold would remain forever buried in the earth or rock. To carry water to mining localities when they were not on the bank of a stream or lake became, therefore, an important and necessary business in carrying on mining. Here, also, the first appropriator of water to be conveyed to such locality for mining or other beneficial purposes was recognized as having, to the extent of actual use, the better right. The doctrine of the common law respecting the right of riparian owners was not considered as applicable, or only in a very limited degree, to the conditions of miners in the mountains. The waters of rivers and lakes were consequently carried great distances in ditches and flumes, constructed with vast labor and enormous expenditures of money, along the sides of mountains and through canyons and ravines, to supply communities engaged in mining as well as for agriculturists and ordinary consumption. Numerous regulations were adopted, or assumed to exist, from their obvious justness for the security of these ditches and flumes, and for the protection of rights to water, not only between different appropriators, but between them and the holders of mining claims. These regulations and customs were appealed to in controversies in the State courts, and received their sanction, and properties to the value of many millions rested upon them. For 18 years, from 1848 to 1866, the regulations and customs of miners, as enforced and molded by the courts and sanctioned by the legislation of the State, constituted the law governing property in mines and in water on the public mineral lands."

These water rights by prior appropriation, as described by Justice Field, were recognized and confirmed by congressional legislation in 1866 and in 1870. Those acts are now sections 2339 and 2340 of the Revised Statutes. Justice Field further adds:

"It will thus be seen that the Federal statutes merely gave a formal sanction to the rules already established. These rules had been built up in reliance on the tacit acquiescence of the United States, the true owner of the lands and waters on which appropriations were made, and these statutes acquiesced therein expressly 'a voluntary recognition of a preexisting right rather than the establishment of a new one.'"

In the case of Broder v. Natoma Water Co. (101 U. S., 274) the Supreme Court, in referring to the contention that these statutes established a new right, uses the following language:

"We are of the opinion that it is the established doctrine of this court that rights of miners who had taken possession of mines and worked and developed them, and the rights of persons who had constructed canals and ditches to be used in mining operations and for purposes of agricultural irrigation in the region where such artificial use of the water was an absolute necessity, are rights which the Government had, by its conduct, recognized and encouraged and was bound to protect before the passage of the act of 1866, and that the section of the act which we have quoted was rather a voluntary recognition of a preexisting right of possession constituting a valid claim to its continued use, than the establishment of a new one."

While the common-law rule prevails—in some instances with slight modifications—in all of the States, except the so-called semiarid or mining States, there can be no doubt that it is in the power of these common-law States by virtue of their sovereignty, to modify or change the rule of the common law. In the language of Justice Brewer (in United States v. Rio Grande Co., 174 U. S., 702–703):

"It is also true that as to every stream within its dominion a State may change this common-law rule and permit the appropriation of the flowing waters for such purposes as it may deem wise."

The same justice, in the case of Colorado v. Kansas (206 U. S., 94), describes the power of the State as follows:

"It may determine for itself whether the common-law rule in respect to riparian rights or that doctrine which obtains in the arid regions of the West of the appropriation of waters for the purposes of irrigation shall control. Congress can not enforce either rule upon any State." (See also McGilvra v. Ross, 215 U. S., 70.)

We append hereto Exhibit A, which names most of the States in which the rule of prior appropriation prevails and also gives the constitutional and statutory provisions, with some of the decisions of the courts relating to the subject in each of these States.

PROPERTY AND RIGHTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Except as the owner of riparian lands and except for the purpose of regulating interstate commerce, the United States has no property in or sovereignty over the streams or water courses within the boundaries of the several States. The sovereignty and ultimate control is in the State, and the proprietorship is either in the State or in the riparian owner, or in both, according to the constitutions and laws of the several States, and the power of the Federal Government over the streams is no greater in the so-called public-land States than in the States east of the Mississippi River. In Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 92), already cited, Justice Brewer declares:

"As to those lands within the limits of the States, at least of the Western States, the National Government is the most considerable owner and has power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting its property. We do not mean that its legislation can override State laws in respect to the general subject of reclamation. While arid lands are to be found mainly, if not only, in the Western and newer States, yet the powers of the National Government within the limits of those States are the same (no greater and no less) as those within the limits of the original thirteen, and it would be strange if, in the absence of a definite grant of power, the National Government could enter the territory of the States along the Atlantic and legislate in respect to improving by irrigation or otherwise the lands within their borders.

THE RIGHTS OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AS RIPARIAN OWNER.

Through the treaty of independence and subsequent treaties with Great Britain, through cessions from foreign countries, and some of the original States of the Union, and through discovery and exploration, and by virtue of its national sovereignty, the Federal Government became the proprietor of a vast domain of unsettled and undeveloped lands. Chancellor Kent (1 Com., 257) describes the title of the United States to this domain in the following language:

"Upon the doctrine of the court in Johnson v. McIntosh, 1823 (8 Wheat., 543), and Fletcher v. Peck, 1810 (6 Cranch, 142, 143), the United States own the soil as well as the jurisdiction of the immense tracts of unpatented lands included within their territories, and of all the productive funds which those lands may hereafter create. The title is in the United States by the treaty of peace with Great Britain and by subsequent cessions from France and Spain and by cessions from the individual States."

By paragraph 2, section 3, Article IV of the Constitution, Congress was given plenary control over this public domain in the following terms:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; * * *."

The power thus conferred on Congress is as full and complete as the power conferred by another paragraph of the Constitution to regulate foreign and interstate commerce. The power of Congress is paramount and plenary in each case. Justice Brewer, in the case of The United States v. Rio Grande Co. (174 U. S., 690, 703), declares:

"Although this power of changing the common-law rule as to streams within its dominion undoubtedly belongs to each State, yet two limitations must be recognized: First, that in the absence of specific authority from Congress a State can not by its legislation destroy the right of the United States as the owner of lands bordering on a stream to the continued flow of its waters, so far at least as may be necessary for the beneficial uses of the Government property. Second, that it is limited by the superior power of the General Government to secure the uninterrupted navigability of all navigable streams within the limits of the United States. In other words, the jurisdiction of the General Government over interstate commerce and its natural highways vests in that Government the right to take all needed measures to preserve the navigability of the navigable watercourses of the country even against any State action."

The rights of the Federal Government as riparian owner is that of a riparian owner at common law. (Sturr v. Beck, 133 U. S., 541; Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal., 336.) This right vested in the Federal Government when it acquired its public domain, and of this right it is not divested on the admission of a State into the Union, for this right is expressly reserved by the Constitution. The title of the Federal Government to the public lands in the States where the rule of prior appropriation prevails antedates the admission of those States into the Union, and over that title the Constitution reserved plenary power of disposal and regulation to the Federal Government. It is only when the Federal Government has entirely parted with that title and it has passed into other ownership that the power of regulation on the part of the Federal Government becomes extinct. The water on the riparian land of the Federal Government is an appurtenance of the land of which it can not be divested without its consent, no more than of its riparian lands. In the case of the United States v. Winans (198 U. S., 371) it was held that the Federal Government had the power to reserve a fishing right for the Yakima Indians in the Columbia River, and that such reservation, though made when the State was a Territory, bound the future State. And in the case of Winters v. The United States (207 U. S., 564) it was held that the Federal Government had the right to reserve the water in the Milk River for the benefit of the Indians and officers of the Government on the Fort Belknap Reservation, in Montana, and that this reservation of the water, though made while Montana was a Territory, bound it after it became a State. The court affirms and asserts the doctrine and rule in these terms:

"Another contention of appellants is that if it be conceded that there was a reservation of the waters of Milk River by the agreement of 1888, yet the reservation was repealed by the admission of Montana into the Union, February 22, 1889 (c. 180, 25 Stat., 676), 'upon an equal footing with the original States.' The language of counsel is that 'any reservation in the agreement with the Indians, expressed or implied, whereby the waters of Milk River were not to be subject of appropriation by the citizens and inhabitants of said State, was repealed by the act of admission.' But to establish the repeal counsel rely substantially upon the same argument that they advance against the intention of the Government to reserve the waters. The power of the Government to reserve the waters and exempt them from appropriation under the State laws is not denied and could not be." (The United States v. The Rio Grande Ditch & Irrigation Co., 174 U. S., 690, 702; United States v. Winans, 198 U. S., 371.)

In the case of Camfield v. United States (167 U. S., 518) the court declares:

"While we do not undertake to say that Congress has the unlimited power to legislate against nuisances within a State which it would have within a Territory, we do not think the admission of a Territory as a State deprives it of the power of legislating for the protection of the public lands, though it may thereby involve the exercise of what is ordinarily known as the police power, so long as such power is directed solely to its own protection. A different rule would place the public domain of the United States completely at the mercy of State legislation."

These opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States have been concurred in by some of the courts of those States in which the rule of prior appropriation prevails.

Judge Rudkin, of the Supreme Court of the State of Washington (now a Federal district judge), in the case of Kendall v. Joyce (48 Wash., 492, 493), declares:

"It has never been contended that a mere squatter on public land who subsequently sells out or abandons his claim acquires, or can acquire, riparian rights in a stream flowing through the land. Riparian rights are a mere incident to ownership in the soil, and, while they may relate back by fiction of law to the date of the settlement or filing, by virtue of the patent subsequently issued, yet they do not vest until patent issues, for up to that time the patent to the land, with all its incidents, is vested in the United States, utterly beyond the power or control of State legislatures. And the party thereafter acquiring title from the Government acquires the land with all its incidents."

In the case of Cruse v. McCauley (96 Fed. Rep., 369), the United States Circuit Court for Montana, through Judge Knowles, declares:

"It must be conceded that the United States, as the proprietor of the land over which the South Fork of McDonald Creek flowed, had a right to the flow of the waters thereof over its land as an incident thereto. In the eastern part of Montana the United States acquired its title to land by virtue of what is called the 'Louisiana Purchase.' There can not be one rule as to the right to the flow of water over its lands in Montana and another rule as to its lands in Iowa and Missouri. In these last-named States there can be no doubt of the rule that the National Government would be entitled to water which is an incident to its land. As the United States then owns the waters which are an incident to its lands, it can dispose of them separate from its lands if it chooses. Section 2339, Revised Statutes, provides:

"'Whenever by priority of possession, rights to the use of water for mining, agricultural, manufacturing, or other purposes have vested and accrued and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and decisions of courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected in the same.'

"The practical construction of this statute has been that as long as land belonged to the United States the waters flowing over the same was subject to appropriation for any of the purposes named, when such appropriation was recognized by the local customs, laws, or decisions of the courts. But if the water was not so appropriated when it flowed over the public domain, it was not subject to appropriation after the land over which it flowed became private property. Patents of the United States to lands contain this clause:

"'Subject to any vested and accrued water rights for mining, agricultural, manufacturing, or other purposes,' etc.

"Certainly this means subject to such water rights as existed at the time when the patent took effect. * * *

"If a person receives a patent from the United States for land subject only to accrued water rights—that is, existing water rights—and as an incident to or a part of this land there is water flowing over the same or upon the same, he would have all the rights the United States had at that time. I do not think any State law or custom can take away such rights, except for some public purpose."

The Federal Government has the undoubted right to lease its riparian and other lands with all their appurtenances. (United States v. Gratiot, 14 Pet., 526.)

Congress has also the undoubted power to create and establish forest reserves on the lands of the United States within any State, and to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to make proper rules and regulations for the use of the same, and to charge a compensation for the use of any portion of the reservation; and such a statute amounts to a revocation of the implied license to graze the public lands, referred to and sustained in the case of Buford v. Houtz (133 U. S., 320). (See United States v. Grimaud, 220 U. S., 506; Light v. United States, 220 U. S., 523.)

In this connection it may be observed that the right to occupy and use the public lands of the United States for canals and ditches, for the appropriation of water for agricultural and mining purposes, is based upon and conferred by the following acts: July 26, 1866 (R. S., sec. 2339), and July 9, 1870 (R. S., sec. 2340). There is, in addition to these acts, the right-of-way law contained in the act of March 3, 1891. (26 Stat., p. 1101.) It is through these laws, and not by virtue of any State authority, that the use of the public domain for the appropriation of water is conferred and acquired.

It is further to be noted that the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat., 847), confers the following-described power upon the President in these terms:

"That the President may, at any time in his discretion, temporarily withdraw from settlement, location, sale, or entry any of the public lands of the United States, including the District of Alaska, and reserve the same for water-power sites, irrigation, classification of lands, or other public purposes to be specified in the orders of withdrawals, and such withdrawals or reservations shall remain in force until revoked by him or by an act of Congress."

In the light of the constitutional provision and of the interpretation placed upon it by the decisions of the Supreme Court and other courts in respect to this subject, it seems clear that the Federal Government, through Congress, has the power to lease its riparian lands, with the waters appurtenant thereto, situate within the several States, for such a period, on such terms, and for such rent as Congress in its discretion may prescribe, but the lessee would, at most, only acquire the common-law usufruct in the water of the appurtenant stream, as defined by Chancellor Kent and Chief Justice Shaw.

THE POWER OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT UNDER THE INTERSTATE-COMMERCE CLAUSE OF THE CONSTITUTION.

For the purpose of promoting and regulating foreign and interstate commerce Congress is given plenary power over all the navigable waters of the United States, to the end of improving and maintaining their navigability; and this power is not limited to the navigable sections of streams, but extends to the tributaries and feeders of the same, for without the control of these the power over the navigable sections might become wholly impotent. (United States v. Rio Grande Co., 174 U. S., 690.) Neither can any limits be placed upon the methods of improving the navigability of streams nor upon the means by which commerce can be carried on upon the same.

Science has in recent years evoked from the great storehouse of nature the hidden and well-nigh limitless power of electricity and utilized the same in various ways for the promotion of commerce, industry, and the domestic and social well-being of mankind. The bounds of such power and use can not well be defined or foretold. That such power has become and may still much further become one of the great instrumentalities of commerce is evident. While sail, aside from the oar, was the only known motive power on water, the limits of navigation was confined to tidewater.

The discovery of steam extended navigation on our streams far beyond the limits of tide water, and who can tell how much further hydroelectrical power generated by a dam in a stream may extend navigation on that or some other stream? The water in a stream may not only be used to float and carry a vessel, a boat, or a barge, but it may also be used to furnish the motive power for the navigation of the same. And a dam erected in a stream carrying interstate commerce can well be utilized for this double purpose; and Congress, having jurisdiction over the improvement and regulation of an interstate navigable stream, has ample power to resort to all reasonable means for the improvement of navigation and the promotion of commerce on such a stream. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1.)

If, for the purpose of improving the navigability of a stream carrying interstate commerce, the Federal Government constructs and maintains a dam, with locks and gates, on its riparian lands or on lands in which it has acquired an easement for such construction and maintenance, the Government has the undoubted right to establish and maintain, in connection with such dam, an electric-power plant for the purpose of furnishing motive power to operate such locks and gates. And the Federal Government has the right to sell, lease, or rent, for compensation, any surplus power that may arise from and be an incident to such an improvement of navigation. (Kaukauna Water Power Co. v. Green Bay & Mississippi Canal Co., 142 U. S., 254.)

This case relates to the construction of a dam for purposes of navigation and the use of the surplus water incident thereto. In 1846 Congress made a grant of land to the State of Wisconsin for the improvement of the navigation of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers. The State assumed the grant and the work. In the act of assumption it was provided among other things:

"Whenever a water power shall be created by reason of any dam erected or other improvements made on any of said rivers, such water power shall belong to the State, subject to the future action of the legislature."

The court, in passing upon the effect of this reservation to the State, declares:

"But if, in the erection of a public dam for a recognized public purpose, there is necessarily produced a surplus of water, which may properly be used for manufacturing purposes, there is no sound reason why the State may not retain to itself the power of controlling or disposing of such water as an incident of its right to make such improvement. Indeed, it might become very necessary to retain the disposition of it in its own hands, in order to preserve at all times a sufficient supply for the purposes of navigation. If the riparian owners were allowed to tap the pond at different places and draw off the water for their use, serious consequences might arise, not only in connection with the public demand for the purposes of navigation, but between the riparian owners themselves as to the proper proportion each was entitled to draw—controversies which could only be avoided by the State reserving to itself the immediate supervision of the entire supply. As there is no need of the surplus running to waste, there was nothing objectionable in permitting the State to let out the use of it to private parties, and thus reimburse itself for the expenses of the improvement."

The court, after further comments and the citation of three Ohio cases, adds:

"The true distinction seems to be between cases where the dam is erected for the express or apparent purpose of obtaining a water power to lease to private individuals, or where in building a dam for a public improvement a wholly unnecessary excess of water is created, and cases where the surplus is a mere incident to the public improvement and a reasonable provision for securing an adequate supply of water at all times for such improvement."

Also, see Green Bay Co. v. Patten Co. (172 U. S., 58), relating to the same water power and dam after the Federal Government had taken over the work and improvement.

In general, it may be said that whenever the Federal Government is engaged in improving the navigability of a stream on which there is interstate commerce, if by reason and in consequence of such improvement, and as an incident thereto, surplus power is created, the Federal Government has the right to lease or sell such power on such terms and for such compensation as it may deem just.

Congress, as in the case of Wisconsin, Ohio, and other States, can delegate the work of improving portions of navigable rivers to States, municipalities, private corporations, and individuals, and if in connection with such improvement and as an incident thereto surplus power is created, Congress may authorize those to whom the right of improvement is delegated to lease and secure compensation for such surplus power. In such cases those to whom the power of making the improvement is delegated are the agents for and stand in place of the Federal Government. But unless such work of improvement is primarily made for the purpose of improving the navigation on streams or other waters carrying interstate commerce, the Federal Government could not confer the power to obtain compensation for the use of the water.

Provision has been made in several acts of Congress for the utilization of surplus water power on navigable streams. In a part of the cases the dam or other improvement has been carried on and made directly by the United States; in other cases by private parties. Senate Document No. 57, first session Sixty-second Congress (see Exhibit B appended hereto), contains a list of the cases where so-called water-power privileges have been granted. The case of the Black Warrior River in Alabama has been added to the document since it was issued.

ANSWER TO THE INTERROGATORIES PROPOUNDED IN THE RESOLUTION.

Coming now, in the light of the Constitution and of the construction and interpretation put upon it by the courts in the authorities we have cited, to the direct consideration of the interrogatories propounded in the foregoing resolution, and before attempting to directly respond to the same, it must be borne in mind that it is always difficult to give a satisfactory and instructive answer to hypothetical or abstract question. It is much easier to solve a concrete case.

As to the first interrogatory, the only answer we can make is this: That whether a stream is navigable or nonnavigable, State or interstate, the rights of the Federal Government as riparian owner are practically the same; and barring any power that may rest in the Federal Government under the commerce clause of the Constitution, that Government has manifestly the right to lease, for compensation and on such terms as it sees fit, its riparian lands with the water appurtenant thereto, but the lessee would not acquire a greater right or interest in such water than the usufruct as defined by the common law, and such right or interest would be subject to and charged with any right acquired under the act of July 26, 1866 (R. S., sec. 2339). The Federal Government has no water power aside from the usufruct, to lease in such case; and if the utilization of the water in a stream is sought beyond such usufruct and for other purposes, authority therefor must be obtained from the State where the residuary power over the water resides.

Responding to the second interrogatory we are of the opinion, divorcing the question from riparian rights, that the Federal Government in authorizing the construction and maintenance of a dam on a navigable stream by States, municipalities, or private parties for the chief and primary purpose of improving the navigation of the stream has the same right to prescribe the terms and compensation for the use of the surplus power, created as an incident to the main improvement, as the Government would have in case it had itself built the dam or made the improvement, and that the Government having delegated the power of building such dam to private parties might well confer upon them as compensation for the work thus undertaken the right to do what the Government itself could do in case it had itself constructed the work. In this connection and as a further response to the interrogatory it must be noted that the mere grant by the Federal Government of authority to construct a dam in a navigable river, not for purposes of navigation, but really for the creation of a water power, is merely a license or permit, the effect of which is that if the dam is constructed and operated conformable to plans approved by the Government, it will not be deemed an obstruction or impediment to navigation. And in such case the Government would be authorized to charge a nominal license fee for inspecting and passing upon the plans and for watching over the work to see that it conforms to the plans and is properly maintained; but the regulative power of the Government would not extend to the use of the water for other purposes than navigation and interstate commerce. In such a case it seems to us that the Federal Government has no water power to sell or charge compensation for, for it is only authorized by the Constitution to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, which in this case means navigation.

As to the third interrogatory it may be remarked that it has in part been responded to in the answer to the first interrogotory. And as a further answer we will add that the Federal Government has under the Constitution plenary power to sell or lease its riparian lands with the water appurtenant thereto, and that if on any such land there is a water-power site, that, as a part of the riparian land, can of course be sold or leased. The Federal Government has no water power distinct or separable from its riparian lands or any water-power site on the same. The only water power the Federal Government owns is the common-law usufruct in the water appurtenant to its riparian lands. In leasing its riparian lands with their appurtenant water, which is all the Government has to lease within the limits of a State, it can no doubt prescribe such terms as it sees fit in respect to rent, duration of lease, and the uses to which the leased premises may be put. It can say in its lease to the lessee, "If you succeed in creating and maintaining a water power on the premises I lease you, you will be required to rent such power on such and such terms. This condition will be in your lease; without it I will not lease you the premises. If you accept a lease with this condition and fail to comply with the condition, your lease will be forfeited." In this connection it must be borne in mind, however, that the leasing of the water-power site as a part of the riparian lands of the Federal Government does not in and of itself confer the right to create a water power. At most, as we have already stated, it merely confers the common-law right of usufruct in the water. If any other or further use of the water in the stream is required, the right to such use must be obtained from State authority, and, therefore, it is difficult to see how water power can be established in such cases without the cooperation or consent of the State.

Several acts have been passed by Congress relating to obstructions, and the construction of dams, in navigable rivers. Among these, to which we call your attention, is the act of September 19, 1890 (26 Stat., 426), which contains important provisions for the removal or change in bridges that are found to be an obstruction to navigation by the Secretary of War, and other provisions relating to the construction of wharves, piers, bridges, etc.

The act of July 13, 1892 (27 Stat., 88), relates particularly to the construction of wharves, piers, and bridges over navigable waters, and requires the approval of the Secretary of War for any improvement or bridge. (See sec. 3, p. 110.)

Section 10 of the act of March 3, 1899 (30 Stat., 1121), prohibits the creation of any obstruction to the navigable capacity of any of the waters in the United States not affirmatively authorized by Congress, etc., and prohibits the construction of any breakwater, jetty, or other obstruction in any river or water of the United States, except on plans recommended by the Chief of Engineers and authorized by the Secretary of War. Section 9 of the same act prohibits the construction of any bridge, dam, etc., over any navigable river without the consent of Congress and without the approval of plans by the Chief of Engineers and Secretary of War.

The act of June 21, 1906 (34 Stat., 386), relates to the construction of dams by parties other than the Federal Government, and the act of June 23, 1910 (36 Stat., 593), is amendatory of the preceding act, and lays down many important rules and regulations for the construction of dams in navigable rivers, etc.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. But the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky does not concern the right to use the waters for navigation. It gives the right to impose a charge or a sum of money for the privilege of using a man's own property—of placing an object in navigable waters on a man's own land—and this charge bears no relation at all to the right of navigation or the use of it for commerce. It uses the act of one of the officials of this Government in regulating commerce as a basis to raise money for the Treasury, which is not at all connected with commerce. That can not be done. The only kind of charges which can be exacted must bear some relation to the service to be performed by the Government. I will read an extract from a decision which seems to cover that point.

In City of Ottumwa v. Zekind (95 Iowa, 622) the court says:

Such charge as would cover not only the necessary expense of issuing it (the license) but also the additional labor of officers and other expenses imposed by the business, but nothing beyond this. * * * The amount of the license fee or charge is to be considered in determining whether the exaction is not really one of revenue or prohibition, instead of one of regulation.

You will note that the amendment bears no necessary relation to the business. It is not necessary for purpose of regulation. It is a plain, bald exaction for revenue, and so can not be a license fee, can not be connected with use for commerce, but is solely for purposes of revenue.

This bill contains three different provisions for charges. One covers the expense of the Government in making the examination; the second, the use of the Government's property in these storage reservoirs and the operation of the reservoirs; and the third, the use of the Government property in the way of the site for the dam and the flowage rights. It is for Congress to prescribe such charges which relate to the use of this project for commerce, and that we do in the bill. But the amendment under discussion bears no relation to commerce at all. It does not help commerce. It only authorizes an official to make a charge as an income to the Government, because he must perform an official act, which may relate to commerce or may relate to something else. But the charge which he may levy has no connection with his act to regulate commerce. Now, let me illustrate the difficulty which you may get into if you allow a proposition of that kind. If this amendment has no relation to the commerce clause, but has a relation to the taxing power and is a part of the taxing power, then it is not germane. An amendment of that kind should come properly from the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. What authority has the gentleman for the proposition that a thing is not germane simply because it might have gone to another committee for consideration as an original proposition? We are not limited simply to the jurisdiction of the committee that brought the bill in here.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; but this bill has relation only to the commerce cases and commerce clauses. It is not attempting to exercise the taxing power of the United States.

Mr. SHERLEY. That bill has relation to dams on navigable streams.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, your power may or may not be dependent upon a particular provision of the Constitution; but there is a good deal of difference between a question of our power under the Constitution legally to do a thing and the right under parliamentary law to offer an amendment on the floor. The right to offer an amendment has nothing to do with the question whether a thing is permissible under the provisions of the Constitution or not.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. This amendment violates both. There is a double objection to it. It not only is not germane, because it is an attempted exercise of the taxing power upon a bill trying to regulate commerce, but in addition it would not be constitutional or valid if it existed by itself as an exercise of the taxing power, because it is not valid on its face since it is not uniform in its application and is not framed in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution. Now, the courts have decided, I think repeatedly, that there is no particular necessary form that a tax should take. A tax may be anything; and I think the courts have held repeatedly, and I think in the income-tax cases the Chief Justice held, that a tax need take no particular form; that it is the substance the court looked to, as to whether or not a particular charge is a tax.

Mr. SHERLEY. They held that in the De Witt case also.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will furnish the Chair with the citations. Of course it is a general rule of law, so that the Chair in deciding this matter will look to see what the substance of this amendment is—whether it is something that makes a charge that is practically a tax against the applicants for these dams that is not borne by those under similar conditions among other classes of the population.

Any charge in the nature of a toll, tribute, or revenue from the water power itself beyond the limits of the license charge as defined is in substance and in fact a tax or excise upon the water power.

Such excise tax is already provided by the Federal income tax, under which each water power pays upon its gross income.

If a further tax or excise upon water powers as such is to be imposed, it can be done only under section 8, Article I of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

SEC. 8. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

If such a charge is to be a direct tax, it can not be levied directly by the Federal Government, but must be apportioned among the States, each State to make the collection. If it is an impost or excise tax, then it must be levied uniformly upon every dam and water power in the country and can not be limited to any particular class of water-power dam. It must extend to all private enterprises upon navigable streams.

A charge or toll beyond a license charge, as above defined, must be one of the two classes of taxes recognized by the Constitution, and that can be imposed only in the manner provided by the Constitution; that is, under the rule of apportionment as to direct taxes and under the rule of uniformity as to duties, imposts, and excises. As said by the Federal Supreme Court (157 U. S., 557):

Thus in the matter of taxation the Constitution recognizes the two great classes of direct and indirect taxes, and lays down two rules by which their imposition must be governed, namely, the rule of apportionment as to direct taxes and the rule of uniformity as to duties, imposts, and excises.

In the case of Thomas v. United States (192 U. S., 363) Chief Justice Fuller says:

And these two classes, taxes so called, and "duties, imposts, and excises," apparently embrace all forms of taxation contemplated by the Constitution.

As was observed in Pollock v. Farmers Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S., 429, 557):

Although there have been from time to time intimations that there might be some tax which was not a direct tax nor included under the words "duties, imposts, and excises," such a tax for more than 100 years of national existence has as yet remained undiscovered, notwithstanding the stress of particular circumstances has invited thorough investigation into sources of revenue. * * * There is no occasion to attempt to confine the words "duties, imposts, and excises" to the limits of precise definition. We think that they were used comprehensively to cover customs and excise duties imposed on importation, consumption, manufacture, and sale of certain commodities, privileges, particular business transactions, vocations, occupations, and the like.

Therefore a toll or charge for revenue or as a tribute can not be imposed in this bill, because, beyond the license charge expressly provided in the proposed act, such charge would be a tax. It must, therefore, be imposed by separate legislation and in the manner provided for the imposition of taxes.

Such charge being a tax, and not properly a part of the exercise of the powers of Congress "to regulate commerce," it can not constitutionally be made a provision in this measure.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. DILLON. If I understand this bill, it grants certain privileges to the grantee, does it not?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. Therefore has not Congress the right to fix the terms upon which it will grant that privilege?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; with this limitation, which the Supreme Court clearly laid down in the Chandler-Dunbar case. I will read it again, so that the gentleman can realize what it means. The Supreme Court in the Chandler-Dunbar case stated this:

That power of use and control comes from the power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations. It includes navigation and subjects every navigable river to the control of Congress.

Now comes the general rule which applies to this and every other proposition confronting this bill and confronting the amendment to the act of commerce:

All means having some positive relation to the end in view which are not forbidden by some other provision of the Constitution are admissible.

Now, there are two provisions in the Constitution, it seems to me, which are violated by a provision of this kind. One is that it is, in substance, a tax; the other that it takes a man's property without due process of law or just compensation.

Mr. SHERLEY. I make the point of order that that does not go to the question of whether the amendment is in order or not. The question whether a provision is constitutional or not does not determine whether an amendment is in order.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It certainly does. If you are trying to exercise the taxing privilege, it is not germane to a bill to regulate commerce, and, secondly, even if it be a tax, on the question of germaneness as now raised it is unconstitutional in form, so that for those two reasons it is not germane, because it is not valid. You can not place a void provision for a tax on a bill to regulate commerce where objection is made.

Mr. DILLON. Is it not wholly immaterial upon those points if Congress grants as a privilege that which is a contract, so that the contractual relation exists between the United States on the one part and the grantee on the other? If that be true, and if it be a contract, has not Congress the absolute right to fix the terms upon which it will issue the contract?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; Congress can not make a contract which in essence is a tax and attempt by means of a contract to levy a tax, because such a method would violate the taxing clauses of the Constitution, which requires that such should be uniform. Congress can not make a contract involving rights under the commerce clause and attempt to exercise rights which it could not do directly by its legislative action. Such would not be good morals or law. For example, by a condition of a contract concerning interstate commerce Congress might try to regulate intrastate commerce and thus oust States of their jurisdiction. No one can claim this could be done. It might seek to compel a man to waive his right of trial by jury in case of dispute. I do not believe that would be valid, yet these would be just as sound as attempting to levy a tax by contract. You would charge this man unequally with his competitors. You place a discretion in an administration official to levy a charge as he pleases upon the use by a man of his own property, which is unequally placed and may be subject to gross oppression. Surely a citizen has some rights under the Constitution. A State may be forced in this way to pay a tax to use its own lands and own waters for its public purposes. Yet you can not tax the sovereign powers of a State.

CONSEQUENCES.

I will show the gentleman in a moment the consequence of this by a practical illustration, and perhaps that will answer his question. The suggestion I have to make is this, that if this be conceded to be a condition of a contract, and if it be allowed, this would be the consequence: Congress might use this method of contracts to raise very large sums of money for revenue or in place of other revenues. It could use this method of raising revenue on every navigable stream in the United States. I am speaking of the logical possibility, not the practical possibility. Consider what this logical possibility to use this method of raising large sums of money would mean. Such an amendment, then, if it is not to be construed as a revenue measure and does not come under the taxing clause, could be offered in the Senate of the United States equally as well as in the House of Representatives. The very moment you concede that this could be offered in the Senate as well as in the House, you concede to the Senate the right to initiate revenue legislation. More than that, on the border streams, like the St. Johns River in Maine, the St. Lawrence River in New York, along the Great Lakes, the Rainy River in Minnesota, the Milk River in Montana, the Rio Grande in the South——

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I want to submit one further inquiry.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Please permit me to make my statement. If this contention be true, then a treaty could be made by which dams could be erected, as they have been under treaties, and large sums of money possibly might be raised under the treaty power, in which this House would have no right at all in the matter of revenue legislation. And if these large sums could be so raised as a condition under the commerce clause, they could be equally raised by similar conditions under the other provisions of the Constitution, and you might then have a situation where the revenues would be entirely raised by treaties on Senate bills.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Please let me make my statement.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then I insist that the gentleman talk to the point of order.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, these gentlemen have no right to interrupt the one who has possession of the floor, without permission of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. SHERLEY. I submit the gentleman's point of order is not well taken. I have the right to interrupt the gentleman, if he is willing to yield, and I have not been out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Connecticut is that the gentleman should first address the Chair.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman knows that I am always very glad to yield to him; but I think in fairness to the Chair and to the committee that when I am trying to make a point it is better to permit me to make my point clearly for whatever it is worth and then submit to interrogations from my friend from South Dakota and my friend from Kentucky. The point is this: That if this amendment be germane, then it could just as well be offered in the Senate, and could be used as a basis for raising revenue by being initiated as the Senate amendment. It could just as well be a part of the treaty with which this House would have nothing to do at all, and yet might raise revenue to put in the Treasury. Again, if the commerce clause can be used as a basis for raising revenue in that way, being initiated in the Senate or being initiated by means of treaties with which this House has nothing to do, in such case this House forfeits its most cherished prerogative of having the right under the Constitution to initiate revenue legislation. This amendment goes directly to the root of the prerogative of this House—to initiate revenue legislation. If this amendment be in order and allowed by the House, it seems to me that we encourage every sovereign power of the Constitution to be the basis of raising revenue, without being initiated here in the House, because only revenue bills are required to be initiated in the House. If this be a revenue bill or a revenue amendment, it must originate in the House. If it be not a revenue matter, then it can originate in the Senate by means of an amendment or by means of a treaty. If it can originate in the Senate by means of a treaty or amendment, and yet by this and similar amendments on Senate bills or treaty provisions sufficient money can be raised to run this Government, then this House forfeits its right to raise revenue, which may entirely control the course of this Nation. So that it is of vital consequence to this House that this precious right shall be preserved and shall not be frittered away by amendments which may be used as precedents against our rights hereafter. This House has always highly estimated its privilege of guarding its right to originate revenue legislation. I refer now to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 16, 1905. Mr. PAYNE rose and said:

I rise to a question of privilege and send the following resolution to the Clerk's desk, to be reported to the House.

The substance of that resolution was this: That when the Agriculture appropriation bill reached the Senate, an amendment was adopted there that paragraph 234 of the act of July 24, 1907, an act to provide revenues, should be held not to be affected by the provisions of said act.

In other words, it repealed the drawback clause of the customs tariff. That was the substance of the Senate amendment. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] took the position that the Senate had no right to do that. A drawback clause, it is true, does not raise money, but pays money out, but it affects the raising of revenue by the United States. He took the position, and I think he was sustained by nearly every speaker on the floor—and I notice the name of Mr. WILLIAMS, now the Senator from the State of Mississippi, and other speakers on both sides—that the House could not afford under any pretext to permit its constitutional prerogative to be invaded.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. And by an overwhelming vote of 206 to 5 the House sent the bill back without considering it further. I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman that this is not a Senate amendment.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; but it might be a Senate amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. But it is not.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is the very point. If the gentleman's contention be correct, it could just as well be imposed in the Senate as here; and if it could be imposed in the Senate, we thus fritter away our prerogative to initiate revenue legislation. That is the point I ask the gentleman to consider. This is the precedent. If we concede that this is not a revenue measure, then it could be made a Senate amendment, and it could be a part of a treaty, and those two methods would provide for raising revenue and ought to originate in the House of Representatives. For that reason, since it does raise revenue, it is a part of the revenue system of the country, and it should come under the taxing clause of the Constitution, and it should originate in the House of Representatives; and if it should originate here, then it is a part of the taxing power of our Government, and it is not germane to this measure.

Now I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. DILLON. I do not think the gentleman has answered my question.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Possibly not.

Mr. DILLON. As I understand, the Supreme Court of the United States has decided, in the Dartmouth College case, that the charter or grant or privilege is a contract. Now, that being true, I ask the gentleman if Congress has not the right to fix the terms upon which it will grant a privilege? In other words, the taking of money for a privilege is a right that Congress has a right to insist upon as its terms upon which the charter shall issue.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman is incorrect. The Constitution provides that Congress shall raise money. It shall raise it by taxation, and there are two different methods of taxation prescribed in the Constitution and no more, and this amendment is neither of them in form, but attempts to be in fact.

Mr. DILLON. But this proposition——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Let me answer the gentleman. There are two methods prescribed in the Constitution by which money shall be raised by taxation. One, the direct tax, must be raised by apportionment; the other, the indirect tax, such as duties, excises, and so forth, which must be uniform. This would probably be construed as an indirect tax for a privilege, as in the Sugar Trust case, and should be uniform upon all enjoying like privileges. But it does not so provide, and so is void. Now, it is true that this very bill provides conditions to the use of this sovereign power, and, as the courts have held many, many times, Congress may levy certain charges relating directly to that use. And whatever relates directly to that use as a part of it Congress can exercise its right to make such charges as relate to that use to meet its expenses. There may be more; there may be less; but that can not be the means, that can not be the basis, of evading the taxing power of the Government.

Mr. DILLON. If the gentleman will permit me further. That is, Congress fixes the terms upon which it will grant a privilege. Those terms are money considerations. Now, the grantee takes it or he does not take it; it is up to him to accept or reject it. Is not that perfectly plain?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; but Congress is limited in its powers by the prohibitions of the Constitution. Congress has no right to raise money in any other way than is prescribed by the Constitution, and this House has no right to direct that money be raised in any other way than by the terms of the Constitution. The gentleman is trying to enforce a method which is prohibited by the Constitution. He is trying to make a condition of a contract, that which Congress is expressly prohibited from doing directly by a legislative act. Such a condition is evidently beyond the power of Congress to place as a part of a contract.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If I understand the gentleman, his reply is substantially this: While Congress can give its consent, it can only give its constitutional consent.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; that is the point.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And if there be a consent it must be within the enumerated powers of the Constitution.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly; that is the point I make.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he approves of the provisions of section 14 in reference to the leasing power?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Is not that a matter of raising revenue?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; Congress has the right under another provision of the Constitution to regulate the use of property of the United States. That is part of the property of the United States just the same as it is part of the public domain, and we can raise whatever we see fit, whatever we can get out of the property of the United States. This is a different proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. If the gentleman will permit me a moment further, the Government itself might construct every one of these dams and lease the surplus water power?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Government surrenders that power the Government surrenders its right to charge compensation, and it is not part of the taxing power——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; the gentleman steps altogether too far. The Government does not surrender. It gives this authority or privilege in this act to do a certain thing affecting commerce. That is all we do by this act, because we are to do certain things affecting commerce. Now, anything that bears some relation to an act affecting commerce, navigation, the use of Government property, we have a right to charge for, and we have no right to use that as a basis for the general raising of revenue, because you call it compensation. The courts have held repeatedly it does not make any difference what you call it; it is what it is.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. The Government might erect these dams, as the gentleman admits, and sell the power.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Surely.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, then, if that is true, is not that a surrender of that right in this bill?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Not at all.

Mr. LENROOT. During the 50 years we could not sell this surplus power.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. This discussion is presumed to be on a point of order raised as to whether it is germane or not, and it is for the enlightenment of the Chairman. Now, the gentleman over there seems to be arguing a question——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McKELLAR). The Chair is ready to rule. The point of order is overruled. The Chair is of the opinion that this amendment to section 2, fixing the terms and conditions on which these rights are to be granted, is clearly germane to the section. The Chair does not think there can be any doubt. The amendment merely enlarges and adds to the terms and conditions which have been set out in the preceding part of the section. Section 2 fixes the terms, conditions, and considerations upon which the Government grants the right or license to use its navigable waters owned by it. This amendment deals directly with the same subject, and is germane to it.

Now, as to the point made by the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] that this is an exercise of the taxing power, the Chair does not believe that this is an exercise of the taxing power at all. The water in navigable rivers is Government property in which the Government is undertaking by this bill to convey rights, in whole or in part, and the consideration for such rights is not a tax but a consideration moving to the Government for the grant of the power or right or license to use such navigable waters, and the Chair does not think the question of taxing power under the Constitution is involved in this matter at all.

The United States is the owner of the waters in navigable streams, under our Constitution as construed by our courts, much after the same fashion that the United States is the owner of our public lands. Under acts of Congress it gives patents to these lands to individuals complying with such laws. The money we receive for such lands is not a tax levied under the taxing power of Congress. In like manner the money to be received by the Government for these water rights, if the amendment should become law, is not a tax, but a consideration for property owned by the Government and disposed of by this law.

Even if the consideration could be called a tax, the Chair still would not think it an unconstitutional measure, because the tax would be but incidental to the main provisions of the bill. And again whether or not the amendment is constitutional is not a question of order under the rules, but a legal question which must be first passed upon by the Members when they vote, and afterwards by the courts, if the amendment becomes the law, and is called in question. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. SHERLEY and Mr. FOWLER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is recognized.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the proposal embodied in my amendment is to give to the Secretary of War the right to charge for the privilege that is given of maintaining a dam for the creation of water power upon navigable streams. I shall not undertake at this time to enter into any lengthy discussion of the power of Congress to put such a condition upon its grant. To my mind there is a clear right which the Government has. It has a right in the flow of the water, and the Dunbar case especially decided that the owner of the land did not have a property right in the flow of the water. Now, we give as to that right of the flow of the water certain privileges to a grantee, and we have, in my judgment, clearly the right to impose the conditions upon which those privileges touching the flow of water shall be given. The question that really concerns this House is the question of whether we want to confer this power.

The trouble with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] is that he is so much opposed to charging that he can not for the life of him see the right to charge. If he was in favor of the proposal to charge, he would have less trouble touching the constitutional rights of the Government to charge. And nearly every man here who is raising legal, technical objections to the doing of these matters is opposed to the doing of them irrespective of the power. Now, I submit to this committee that there will be many water powers developed that will have great value, value granted to a grantee, that will be capable of immense capitalization. Men here would have you believe that every development that is going to take place is going to be one of great risk and that the grantee is going to be a heroic public benefactor for entering upon it at all. That has not been the history of Federal grants in the past and it will not be in the future. The improvement that takes place in connection with the development of power, the invention of man, will make many a proposition that is now attractive unusually attractive in the future.

I wish it were possible to make this committee realize the physical condition of the world 50 years ago, to pass before their minds the inventions that have been made within the past 50 years, and see the absolute transformation of the physical aspect of the world, to realize that we are doing things to-day that if suggested then would have been thought the vaporings of an absolutely insane mind. We are conquering all the forces of nature. Here you propose to tie up a right for 50 years and yet not to provide that under any conditions may compensation be asked by the Government. I submit that it is folly. The whole tendency of America, the tendency of every State in the Union, has been to shorten the life of charters and of special privileges given. Every fight in the courts from the days of the Dartmouth College case to now has been to unshackle the people from the claim of contract right that was set up in that case and to prevent the mortgaging of the future.

I do not require that the Government must charge. I do not undertake to fix what shall be the charge. I have not the egotism of some of those who think they can span the future with the flimsy bridge of thought, and determine what ought to be done here and now. But I am in favor of giving a discretion to a Government official that he may protect the people in a valuable property right. And no amount of argument can convince me that we have not the power to reserve such a right when the individual, no matter what land he owns, no matter what grant he gets from the State, could not proceed one moment in the construction of a dam without the consent of Congress. Our control over navigable waters compels him to come to seek the concession from us, and we have a right to put the conditions upon the concession granted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended one minute. I would like to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Your amendment, as I understand, provides that the Secretary of War or the Chief of Engineers may prescribe these charges hereafter?

Mr. SHERLEY. And that at the end of 30 years he may readjust them, and 10 years after that.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Does not the gentleman think it would be well to say, "The Secretary of War, the Chief of Engineers, or Congress"?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I think it is perhaps better to leave it with the administrative officers than it is to leave it with Congress. And the reason I want to leave it that way is, in the first place, I think that they will have as much knowledge of cost of operation and maintenance and the factors that determine what can and should be paid as we will, and perhaps more. And further, I want to leave it there because of the thing I spoke of the other day, and that is the inertia of Government. If you require that Congress must readjust, then you can put all the methods of obstruction that are so potent to interfere with Congress taking action.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has again expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not want a condition where all of these forces will interfere with the action of the Congress when it seeks to take away some privilege that should not have been granted. We have many theoretical rights that do not amount to a row of pins as practical rights.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I understand that; but even if they put the provision in here, "the right to amend, alter, or repeal, etc., is reserved," which is the inertia of Government that you speak of, it would still prevent the Government, as a matter of fact, from ever exercising the right to amend, alter, or repeal in any material particular.

Mr. SHERLEY. Here is my answer to that: The right to amend, alter, or repeal should be reserved; but that has nothing to do with the specific proposition here, and I am not so much concerned as to whether the power is given to the Secretary of War—although I think that is where it ought to be—as I am concerned in the establishment of the principle that we may and should reserve the right to charge.

Now, gentlemen who follow me will tell you that the putting of this amendment upon the bill would prevent the development of water power. I repeat, I do not know where they get this power of prophecy, this power to see events hidden in the future, and I suggest again that you have no right to assume as a premise that where a proposition is such that it would not bear any such payment such a payment will be required. I assume that these engineers, whom in one breath they praise to the skies and in the next breath condemn, will have common commercial sense enough not to put conditions in a contract for the purpose of preventing its being entered into, and all their premises are based upon the assumption that somebody representing the Government is going to be so lacking in gray matter that he will go out of his way to prevent anybody on earth from developing anything. That has not been the history of the past. The trouble is that the Government in the past did not get a good enough contract.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest to what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said this morning about the bill which the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce passed through this House at the time he was chairman of that committee, and I concur in what he said, to the effect that it was not the general dam law that now stands on the statute books which prevented the building of dams in this country. So far as the interests of those who are concerned in the building of dams go, the law that is now on the statute books is a very good law. It gives all the machinery of law and all the permission that is necessary to dam navigable rivers and protect navigation, so far as that is concerned. But certain gentlemen in this House and in the Senate have conceived the idea that the public interest has not been protected.

Now, I also concur in what the gentleman from Illinois said this morning, that under the law as it is on the statute books to-day there is ample authority to authorize the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers to make contracts with the builders of dams that will fully protect the public interests.

But we are facing a condition and not a theory. Certain gentlemen conceive the idea that it is their business to protect the public here, before it goes to the Secretary of War, with the result that all development, practically, under the law has been stopped either in the House or in the Senate or by a President of the United States. The purpose of presenting this bill to Congress was to meet objections of that kind, to modify the law along the lines that certain gentlemen claim must be met in order to protect the public interest, and put a law on the statute books by which any person desiring to build a general dam might come here and have a bill passed through the House as you pass a bridge bill, and avoid the continual delays and fights that grew out of the attempts to pass bills under the present law.

Now, it was stated this morning that, so far as this bill goes, it is a recession from the present law, so far as the public interests are concerned. Really, as a matter of fact, there is not a great deal of change in this bill, so far as the building of dams is concerned or the authorization of power to the engineers. Practically and substantially it is the same as the law now on the statute books. The main changes in this bill are in the direction of protecting the rights of the public, and there are two very important provisions in the bill in the interest of the public. One is the provision that gives a right to regulate the charge for the use of the electricity that comes from these dams, either by the State or by the Federal Government, and the other is the right of the Government itself, or under Government authority for somebody else, to take back this property at the end of 50 years.

Now, I can not conceive how any gentleman can say that with those two provisions added to the present law this bill is not an advance in the interest of the public instead of a moving away from it.

But I want to address the House particularly as to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. These amendments have been offered before. It is known that the same proposition was sought to be put on the Coosa Dam bill when it passed this House some time ago. The House rejected it and the Senate rejected it. It is perfectly well known that a proposition of this kind was added to the bill authorizing the construction of the dam proposed to be built in Connecticut, and it defeated the bill in the United States Senate.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not yield now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama declines to yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was fought out there on the great constitutional question as to whether or not the Government of the United States had a right to fix a charge for the running water in a stream.

Now, I do not believe it has. I do not think there can be any issue about this fact, that no one can build a dam across a navigable stream and be assured that the Government will not pull it down when the Government grants its consent. He may go and build it, so far as the Government does not agree to use it for the purpose of navigation; but at any time the Government determines that it wants to make that river navigable, and his dam does not suit, it can pull down the dam, of course. Therefore the Government stands as an obstruction in the way of development if its consent is not granted; because no one man with money to invest would put his money in a dam that might be torn down in a year by the Government of the United States. And necessarily he must get the consent of the United States before he can build the dam. It is not a matter of the right to control the falling waters, but because the Government has the right to control navigation.

I also agree to the fact that if the Government can prevent his building the dam, for that reason it can also say, "We will grant our consent on certain terms"; and, of course, if the Government will not grant this consent on any other terms he can not get the consent unless he agrees to the terms. They may hold him up, just as a highwayman will hold up a man in the road with a shotgun, and demand his purse. He has got to deliver his purse or have his head blown off, but that does not make it right that the highwayman should take the purse. Now, gentlemen talk about this question of taxation as if it were a matter that the Government could exercise at any time. What do you levy taxation for? Why, you levy it for certain governmental purposes. There is no other reason to put the burdens of taxation on anybody except for governmental purposes, and a charge of this kind is, in effect if not in name, the same proposition as levying taxes. This is not Government property. This is supposed to be the property of the man who builds the dam, unless you say that falling water is Government property; and if you do that, you can levy a tax not only for the use of the water in running that power dam, but you can levy a tax on the water that is pumped out of the Ohio River in the district of the gentleman from Kentucky and used by the people of that city for washing and drinking purposes. Or you might levy a tax on the water that is pumped out of the Ohio River for the great industrial plants in the gentleman's city, and say that you can not operate industrial plants in the city of Louisville, Ky.—because you have got to have water to use in those plants—unless you pay tribute to the United States Government. There is no distinction between those matters.

But why should you levy this tax? There is no deficit in the Federal Treasury. You have a law on the statute books that is producing sufficient money to supply the needs of the Government at the present time, and, in my opinion, will produce a very large surplus at the end of the next fiscal year. And what do you want with it? There could be no reason in the world for levying this tax except to place a burden on the people who use the power. That is all. You have got in this bill a provision that if the State does not regulate the rates in the interest of the people, the Government of the United States, acting through the Secretary of War, may regulate the rates in the interest of the people. Now, I assume that that will be done, because if we assume that neither the State nor the Government is going to fix a just and fair rate in the interest of the people of the United States, we might as well abandon all this proposition, and the gentlemen who say that they wish to conserve the interest of the people of the United States might as well abandon it, because they admit that they have not got a Government that would carry out their wishes or the interests of the people.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the gentleman not to interrupt me just now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, assuming, as I do, that the rate that is going to be charged for the use of this water power is going to be a reasonable and just rate, if you impose a charge for the use of the water in addition to that, what will happen? There is only one thing that can happen. If the original charge authorized by the State or the Federal Government for the use of that power is reasonable, and is what the man who builds the dam is entitled to, if you put an additional charge on it, that additional charge must be handed down to the consumers of the power.

Now, this is all there is to it. If the charge is unreasonable, then the people can go to the power exercising the authority and reduce that to a reasonable charge. And if it is reasonable, you can not force the owner of the dam to go beyond that reasonable amount, and when the tax is added you must add it to the reasonable charge and put that burden upon the people, whether they are burning electric lights or whether they are using it for manufacturing purposes. So, in my judgment, there is no reason in the world for levying a tax on the people, if you are going to regulate it in the interests of the people. I have never seen any town in my life where they did not want as cheap electricity for lighting and heating purposes as they could possibly get. I have never seen a place yet where electricity was used for industrial purposes that it was not beneficial to give them cheap power rather than high-priced power. Now, the danger of the gentleman's proposition is this, and it is a very serious danger: It is that when the Government of the United States picks out one lone community, or, if you want, for the sake of argument, say a dozen or score of communities, and fixes a charge or tax on them, no matter how unjust that tax may be, it is almost impossible to get it off, because they have not the power or strength to throw it off themselves, and those who are getting the tax keep it in their pockets; and those who are getting the tax in this instance would be the other districts in the United States that are not being taxed. It was for that very reason, realizing the oppressive incidents of local taxation that the colonists had to bear under a despotic British rule, that the fathers of our Constitution placed in the Constitution the provision that taxation in this country should be uniform. I have always believed that the intent of the constitutional convention was to make absolute uniformity in relation to taxation; but John Marshall, in construing the Constitution of the United States, said that uniformity in that instance meant geographical uniformity, and that itself is a great protection against oppression, because if the charge that is levied is the same in my district and your district, or a large number of districts, then, if it becomes oppressive and unjust, there is power in this House to overthrow the tax and remove the burden from the backs of the people.

But if you pick out one individual community here and there and authorize the putting of a tax on their backs, no matter how burdensome it is, the benefit of the tax is going to the balance of you, and it would be a long day before public sentiment would be aroused so that it would throw off the injustice of that tax.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I beg the gentleman not to interrupt me now.

Mr. SHERLEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the standpoint from which I look at this. I say that outside of the constitutional question entirely, if you have a regulation in the interest of the people, you have to assume that that regulation is not going to allow a charge that is unreasonable; and if it is unreasonable, there is no sane reason on earth for adding to the burden of the people by putting an additional charge on their backs for the use of one of the great conveniences of life.

But coming down to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky. He said in his argument that it would be said by those in opposition to it that you could not build any dams if you put this provision in the bill—and the gentleman from Kentucky was absolutely right about his own amendment. He told the truth. If you put his amendment in the bill, you could not build a dam in the United States, so far as a sane man with capital is concerned.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not wish to be discourteous, but I would like to conclude what I have to say.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman has had twice the time that I have had—and I am glad he has; but this question is supposed to be for the enlightenment of us all.

Mr. ADAMSON. I asked for additional time for the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I occupy as little time on the floor of this House as anybody, and all I ask is that when I have the floor I be let alone to say what I desire to say.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky does not fix any particular rate, but it says that as a condition of this grant it shall provide for the payment to the United States of reasonable annual charges for the benefits that accrue to the grantee for authority given under this act at the end of 20 years, and every 10 years thereafter the Secretary of War may readjust the annual charges.

Now, he does not fix any rate. The Secretary of War has the authority to fix the rate when he makes the contract. But the most vicious part of the proposition and the one I say would not allow any sane man to invest in any enterprise of this kind, is where the gentleman says that at the end of 20 years the Secretary of War may increase the rate if he wants to and may again increase it at the end of another term of years. Why, I do not think that the Secretary of War would be so foolish as to tax a man out of existence because he had this power, but I want to say to you gentlemen that the men who organized this Government refused to give the power of taxation to anybody but the representatives of the American people. [Applause.]

They limited this power of taxing the people, they put it in your hands, and primarily in the hands of this House, because you have got to report to a constituency at the end of every two years, and if you are guilty of an abuse of the taxing power, your political existence can be brought to an end.

And yet the gentleman from Kentucky would ask you to surrender this sovereign power of taxation, a power that was wrung from the Crown by your English forefathers hundreds of years ago, and would again place that power in the hands of the Executive without limitation on the abuse of the power. [Applause.]

Whether a Secretary of War would abuse this power or not, it takes millions to build these dams, and would any man with millions to invest take the chance of putting his money into an enterprise without limitation in charge, where the charge in the future by some unthinking Secretary of War might be made so great that it would absolutely confiscate his property? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama, my good friend from Minnesota, and other speakers who have been advocating this bill have repeatedly charged me with not being accurate in my statement of what this bill contains. I know these gentlemen do not mean to be personal in any way, and I do not speak of it for that reason. Whatever I have said, Mr. Chairman, I repeat now, that there is not a line in the bill as originally presented, or in its present form, that is not a concession to the water-power interests. I do not say, Mr. Chairman, that some of those concessions are not proper or that they ought not to be made. I do not take that position at all, but I do want to say that they are concessions, every one of them.

The gentleman from Minnesota to-day undertook to set out two things that he said the bill contained of public interest that the old law did not contain. One was the right to impose the duty on the Secretary of War to consider a comprehensive plan of navigation and to approve the plan with reference to the dam. That very provision is in the act of 1910. It is amended, but the right is there to the fullest extent.

He said there is another provision in this bill that was not in the old law, making the right of navigation paramount to the power interests. Mr. Chairman, that is true, and that is also in the present act of 1910, giving the Secretary of War absolute power to control in the interest of navigation, and making navigation paramount to the water power.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has pointed out two great rights which he says are contained in this bill, but are not in the present law. One of them is power of regulation, regulation by the Secretary of War in the first instance, and, as he says, giving the States the power to regulate if they are willing to provide adequate regulations.

Mr. Chairman, so far as the power to regulate is concerned, there is nothing in the act of 1910 that does not permit Congress to exercise the fullest power with reference to regulation. That is a power that we can always exercise. That need not be a part of this dam bill at all, because it rests upon an entirely different proposition; but so far as that power is concerned, Mr. Chairman, what does it do? It gives the Secretary of War power to regulate interstate commerce only when the States themselves have not made adequate provision for doing so, and in that case surrenders the power that we now have to him without regulation. So that if there is anything to that proposition it is a surrender of a power that Congress now has rather than a safeguarding of it.

With reference to this matter of compensation I do not believe we ought to insist upon compensation in every case. I believe the Secretary of War ought to have the right, and it should be confined to the original approval, that he should determine in approving the plans and specifications, whether compensation should be provided, but, Mr. Chairman, there are a number of instances where compensation to the Government is the only method possible of doing equity. The gentleman the other day in his very eloquent speech spoke of a cyanamid plant involving 100,000 or more horsepower. Will the gentleman tell us how regulation upon the part of the State or by the Secretary of War is going to take care of the public interests in electric power furnished to a cyanamid plant owned by the cyanamid company itself?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Would the gentleman want to increase the charge that would ultimately go into the cost of fertilizer?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman has spoken of that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman would not want to have the fertilizer cost any more?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad the gentleman spoke of that. The gentleman is the majority leader upon this floor. The last tariff bill that was passed bears his name. The gentleman, as a Democrat and properly upon the Democratic theory, takes the position that any tariff rate that is imposed in the way of protection is a burden to the consumer, because the domestic producer will charge up to the amount of the import price. That is logical from that standpoint. But how does the gentleman reason when we come to consider cyanamid? He speaks of importation of cyanamid from Chile and how much it costs; and in his speech he assumes that if we can manufacture cyanamid in this country we are going to drop away below the price of cyanamid from Chile through the generosity and philanthrophy of the cyanamid manufacturer. Is that consistent with the gentleman's theory with reference to a tariff for revenue only?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, but the gentleman will tell the truth about this proposition. I said the tax was levied by the Chilean Government. There is no tax in this country on fertilizer of any kind.

Mr. LENROOT. If cyanamid costs a certain amount landed in New York, according to the gentleman's tariff theory, the cyanamid company manufacturing cyanamid in this country will charge just below what it can be imported for; and if that is not the gentleman's theory, I do not know what his Democracy is.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The first company would charge just below, I said; but when you get another company, it would charge a little lower, and ultimately the competition that would grow out of the development of this business would reduce the price.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the gentleman. That is exactly the theory of the Republican Party standing for a protective tariff system [applause on the Republican side], that by imposing tariff rates that will permit the upbuilding of home industries competition among our home industries will bring the prices down; but the gentleman from Alabama through all of the years past has steadfastly denied that, and said that it was robbery.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman has not done anything of the kind. The gentleman says that you can have competition under an open door at the customhouse as well as you could under a protective tariff, and your protective tariff cuts off the competition instead of increasing it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question, and that is this: If the reasoning of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is right, that you must not charge compensation because that puts an added burden on the grantee, does not his logic force you to the conclusion that you should not require any condition that causes the grantee to spend money?

Mr. LENROOT. Absolutely.

Mr. SHERLEY. What is the difference between having to build something that costs money and having to pay the money, so far as the burden on the grantee is concerned?

Mr. LENROOT. But, Mr. Chairman, I want to get back to the gentleman's position. The gentleman can not contend that the power of regulation in this bill can be of the slightest public benefit in the cyanamid case, to which he referred, because you regulate the price of the water-power company, owned by the cyanamid company, that they shall charge themselves, and you have done absolutely nothing. You have taken money out of one pocket and put it into the other, both pockets being those of the cyanamid company.

There is still another feature. Regulation of water power, Mr. Chairman, is not possible to the same extent or in the same way that regulation of other public utilities is, because every other public utility, a street railway or an electric-light company, furnishing their power by steam, is unlimited in capacity to furnish power. They can be compelled by State or sovereign authority to furnish such utilities and such service as the market demands. That is not true with reference to a water-power company.

They can only be compelled to furnish such facilities as their dam sites enable them to originate power. Here is a community where they utilize 50,000 horsepower to-day. Here is a river near by that has a capacity with a dam in it of 10,000 horsepower and that horsepower is developed, and say that 10,000 horsepower is developed for one-half what steam power can be developed for, and where the steam power furnishes that community with 50,000 horsepower, these 50,000-horsepower consumers can not demand of this water-power company to furnish them all the power they need, because it is impossible. They can only furnish one-fifth; that is all they have got, and they can only furnish that amount, and can not be compelled to furnish to others. Now, then, it comes to the rates. The usual standard of a fair rate is a reasonable return on the value of the property after paying operating expenses; but will that apply in the case of the water-power company? No; not necessarily, because there is another element there to be considered, and that is where you have these 50,000-horsepower users and the water-power companies can only furnish 10,000 horsepower, then the question comes, Will it not be a discrimination that we give four-fifths of the users—or allow one-fifth of the users to get their power at one-half the price that the four-fifths pay? And that must be taken into consideration. Here are two factories alongside of each other competing. One of them gets this water power; the other gets the steam power. Would it be fair to let one secure from a public utility power costing them $40 a year, while the other gets power from another public utility which would cost them $80 a year, and that would drive them out of business? And so, Mr. Chairman, any public-utility commission or the Secretary of War, if he has jurisdiction, will take into consideration that other element, and the result would be, in every case where there is not water power sufficient to furnish the entire market, that the cost of the water power will be determined by the cost of the steam power, and when that is true the only way that the public can get any benefit they could receive would be by compelling the water-power companies to return either to the State or the Nation that excess over and above a reasonable return by way of compensation, such as is provided for in gentleman's amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, can I ask unanimous consent to occupy 10 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, while water power is one of nature's richest gifts, yet it has lain dormant in America, much like electricity, for centuries. It has been used in other countries with much success and with a great deal of profit. That it is a cheap power and needs to be harnessed and utilized for economic reasons we all agree. That the navigable streams will afford power for public-utility purposes and for operating factories throughout the land there can be no question, and I am anxious that some general legislation should be enacted whereby it can be harnessed and placed under the control of the magic touch of civilization, so that the people can get the benefit of it readily. But in doing so we ought to be exceedingly cautious. It now belongs to the people. The right of Congress to dispose of it is incident to the power to regulate commerce among the several States.

The contention of some gentlemen is that this water power ought to be granted for a long period of time without adequate consideration to the United States. With them I do not agree. If it is desirable at all, it is worth something. Whatever it is worth is an element to be considered in this bill. If it is worth nothing, then this bill is useless. If it is desirable, then the right to control its application to business and fix the terms for regulating the same and providing for an adequate compensation for such use should be fixed in no uncertain terms. Some of our able constitutional lawyers have raised the constitutional question as to whether we can levy a tax in a bill disposing of water power. Now, I do not view it as a constitutional question in the sense in which they do. I view it in the sense of a valuable right owned by the Government, with a proposition to concede it to others. This can be done only by contract, just the same as was done in the sale of the battleships Idaho and Mississippi to Greece a few days ago. We did not propose to cede those two vessels to a foreign country for nothing, but we fixed a reasonable compensation in the contract for their sale, and it was paid. Water power stands in the same category of contracts. If we provide for the transfer of the right to generate water power to corporations, it must be done by contract, and the terms of that contract ought to be specific.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does not the gentleman agree that the people at large derive the great benefit from the development of this power for use in industries and commerce?

Mr. FOWLER. I think they will; but I think the people in the immediate localities where the water power is generated will probably receive the greatest benefit from it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is not that a consideration then; that when these developments are largely scattered, perhaps in the course of a few years they may favorably affect the industries in many parts of the country and the Nation itself derive a benefit thereby?

Mr. FOWLER. The Nation as a nation derives a benefit from every upward step taken, whatever that may be.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then there is no analogy between that and the sale of a gunboat to Greece, from which as a nation we can derive no special benefit.

Mr. FOWLER. But it is nevertheless done by contract and should be governed by the law of the contracts. Simply because the people of the country will be benefited as a whole is no reason why we should give this power away. We have conceded nearly all the valuable rights within our borders to corporations, and this is about the only thing we have left, and before ceding this right to corporations it is our duty to secure an adequate consideration therefor as well as the right of regulation.

In my own State, in the fifties, it was proposed to grant to the Illinois Central Railroad Co. a franchise to build a railroad through the State, north and south. But some of the wisest men in the legislature said that for such franchise the corporation ought to pay a consideration. We had made then, according to the debate at that time, the same character of speeches as have been made here by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] and all the rest of the advocates of the terms in this bill. But the wisdom of the Illinois Legislature prevailed in favor of the people of Illinois, and the Illinois Central Railroad ever since 1855 has paid into the treasury of the State of Illinois 7 per cent of its gross income.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] yield to his colleague?

Mr. FOWLER. In a moment. It started in 1855 by paying $28,000 into the treasury, and last year it paid into the treasury between $600,000 and $700,000. And up to the present time it has paid between $30,000,000 and $40,000,000 into the treasury of the State of Illinois.

Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that the 7 per cent paid in by the Illinois Central Railroad to the State of Illinois is not only in consideration of the franchise granted but the great land grant that was given to the Illinois Central?

Mr. FOWLER. It is true that the Illinois Central Railroad received a land grant from the State.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to occupy 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask my colleague if it is not a fact that the Illinois Central Railroad Co. got the actual title to the lands in question, and they conveyed them by deed to the purchasers?

Mr. FOWLER. The Illinois Central Railroad has the right of way over the territory through which it passes. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the Illinois Central Railway paying now 7 per cent of the gross receipts over all of its lines or just those lines in the State of Illinois?

Mr. FOWLER. Only in Illinois, and there has been some question about paying on its leased lines as feeders to the main line in Illinois, which, as I understand, are operated in connection with the main lines, but do not pay the 7 per cent.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Only for a moment.

Mr. McKENZIE. I know my colleague wants to be fair, and he does not want to make any mistakes. Now, is it not a fact that the Illinois Central Railroad, instead of getting a right of way only, got every alternating section for 10 miles each side of the right of way, and is it not also a fact that they only pay into the treasury of the State of Illinois 7 per cent of the gross earnings of the chartered line in the State of Illinois?

Mr. FOWLER. I practically answered that in my answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. But it does not make any difference what else the Illinois Central Railroad received in that grant. It was primarily for the right of building a railroad and operating that railroad in Illinois. This road did receive from the State of Illinois about 3,000,000 acres.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit me, it makes this difference: The Illinois Central runs through the section from which I come. If the shippers in my section are being taxed in order to pay money into the treasury of the State of Illinois, we are not getting much benefit from that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. FOWLER. If I can get a little more time. I have something else to say, but I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I want to say in answer to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] that the 7 per cent is counted only on the traffic on the lines from Cairo to Chicago and from Centralia to Dunlieth. And the railroad company and the State recently had some trouble with reference to the proportion of earnings upon which it should pay the 7 per cent, and I believe the company admitted that the division had not been properly made theretofore, and settlement was made by payment of a considerable sum by the railroad to the State. It does not pay any per cent on the traffic through Tennessee.

Mr. FOWLER. No contract could be made by Illinois to affect rates or division of income outside of her own territory, and for this reason no other State has been affected by this wise provision. The concession that the Illinois Central Railroad received was primarily for the construction of a railroad, and it was through the influence of such great men as Stephen A. Douglas, who, as I recollect, was a member of the legislature at the time when this concession was given—it was through his long-sighted wisdom and that of other statesmen like him that the State of Illinois to-day enjoys the benefit of that handsome income. Notwithstanding the payment of this sum into the State treasury, it is one of the best roads in the State.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if every other railroad in the State of Illinois and all other corporations had been required to pay 7 per cent of their gross income into the State treasury, we could have built hard roads throughout the State of Illinois without taxing a single citizen of the State for the payment thereof. There are in other States similar railroads and corporations, and if the States of this Union had required when the franchises were granted away the payment of 7 per cent of the gross income, there is no doubt in my mind of its sufficiency to furnish ample revenue to defray the expenses of State government, thereby leaving the counties to defray the county expenses only.

Now, the same thing is true with this water power. If we start in by taxing the grantee of these rights a certain percentum of the gross income—and I have an amendment that I am going to offer for not less than 5 per cent of the gross income—we may in the future, maybe 50 years from now, realize an income from this source which will defray largely the expenses of this Government.

We have in this country now, according to the Commissioner of Corporations, 305.386 corporations. They have a capital stock of $61,000,000,000 in round numbers, with a bonded indebtedness and other indebtedness of $34,000,000,000. They have a net income now of about $4,000,000,000. Ten per cent of that income is $400,000,000—enough in one year to dig the Panama Canal; enough in five years to build 2,000,000 miles of hard roads in America; enough, if properly used, to make America in all of its tough and rough places blossom like the rose and flourish like a trust. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Would the gentleman from Illinois be in favor of imposing a charge on the construction of bridges across navigable waters?

Mr. FOWLER. If a bridge across a navigable stream were used for the purpose of collecting tribute from the people, I say yes.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Take railroad bridges.

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly. Railroads ought to be treated in the same way as the water-power companies, and, although we have given away these rights in the past, is that any reason why we should so continue until we have given away all we have? Let us wait no longer, but let us begin now in this bill to protect American rights.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Following the same principle, should there not be a tax imposed upon boats that use the water to carry them down?

Mr. FOWLER. Well, I do not care to go off on a tangent. But I do want to direct the attention of the House to the fact that water power is known to be the cheapest power in the world. The corporations that get control of the navigable streams of this country and are able to utilize the water power will be able to drive everybody else out of business, and when everybody else is out of business—I mean the people who generate their power by means of coal and other means—when opposition is out of the way, then these great masters of cheap production will regulate the prices and fix them as they please, and 50 years from now, or maybe much sooner, the people of this country will be asking why the Sixty-third Congress did not protect the rights of our posterity while framing this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GRAY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not assume to be a teacher of men. I am only an anxious inquirer after truth that I may vote intelligently on this question.

I have discovered a new school of conservationists, a school that proceeds on the theory that the way to conserve the natural wealth of the world to the use of people is to give it away to a few persons. [Laughter.] I am opposed to that school of conservationists. I believe that every human being born into the world inherits a part of it, which he takes by a natural, superior title and which even the Congress, under the Constitution, has no power to alienate or divest without full compensation to the people.

These gentlemen talk about the taxing power as the only power to be invoked and the impossibility of its application. There is a great play upon the taxing power. It is invoked or denied as the purpose to be served requires. It has been the resort, as a valid power, in tariff legislation to defeat competition and create monopoly. But now when valuable water rights are to be granted its force and application are seriously questioned and denied in order to take from the people the wealth they have inherited without compensation.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is not the taxing power here involved. The taxing power is a great, absolute power arbitrarily exercised by the Government—the power to levy and collect taxes from the people; the power to go into the people's pockets and take their money; the power to seize their property and sell it, or hold it for the payment of money; in fact, the power to take their money, their property, and the fruits of their toil and labor; and behind which there is all the civil and military authority of the Government to enforce it. The taxing power is enforced by summary proceedings against the people. It is true, before you can enforce the payment of taxes against a citizen you must give him some kind of notice. But whether he consents or not, whether he agrees or not, or whether he acquiesces or not, you take from him his money, his property, and the fruits of his labor. This is the exercise of the taxing power.

There is a difference between the exercise of the taxing power and enforcing compensation under contractual rights and for value received from the people. In the last instance the man pays the money as a voluntary act. It is not taken from him under a summary proceeding. He pays it as his free choice and will in compliance with his contract which he agrees to in accepting the grant from the Government. This is not the exercise of the taxing power. It is a contractual relation, a voluntary obligation incurred, and the only man who could raise the constitutionality of the right to collect tolls or charges would have waived all question of the enforcement of such payment by his acceptance and voluntary agreement. They stubbornly insist that this is the exercise of the taxing power only to deny its application in order to take from the people their natural and inherited property rights without compensation, the title to which we have not the right to divest, alienate, or to convey or transfer without their receiving full value in return.

The Government leases oil lands, coal lands, and mineral land, and collects rentals, but not under the exercise of the taxing power. It is the enforcement of payment under agreement. It is admitted that the Government may itself construct a dam and generate and sell power and electrical energy to any number of consumers, and it is difficult to understand why the Government can not sell to one firm or corporation at wholesale in its crude form what it may sell at retail to many in its manufactured and marketable state.

I am for this amendment, and I want to define the principle upon which I will give it my support. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I first wish to say that until the decision in what has been called in this debate the Chandler-Dunbar case, decided by the Supreme Court May 26, 1913, no opinion of this great court can be cited to sustain the amendment now under consideration. This decision I do not think so holds, but I will discuss it later.

The right of the Federal Government to regulate interstate commerce, and therefore to regulate navigation in the navigable rivers of the States—for navigation under such power is the chief, if not the sole, instrument of commerce—has never been squarely held to authorize the Federal Government to appropriate to itself and for its benefit revenues derived from the sale of water power.

The authority of the Federal Government to control or regulate navigable waters rests alone upon the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States and foreign nations. There is not a shadow of foundation of Federal jurisdiction for such purpose except what is afforded by this express sanction of the Constitution.

Now, obviously this power to regulate or control navigation does not give the Federal Government the right to sell the water or water power of such rivers, unless thereby navigation is preserved or promoted. Unless such sale or disposition of the water power is fairly to subserve this purpose, the Federal Government transcends its constitutional limitations.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the settled law of the land has always been that, except and subject to this sovereign right of navigation by the Federal Government, the States, or the riparian owners, or both, have all other regulatory power to control, of any nature whatsoever, in the navigable waters within the United States. In other words, the power of the Federal Government to regulate navigation means the power to control or use the waters for this purpose. The power so to regulate can not mean the power of the Federal Government to sell the waters for private commercial purposes. If the latter is to be accomplished, it must be done by the States or their citizens under the authority of the States.

If the use of the rivers for power purposes conflicts with the regulation or control of the rivers for navigation purposes, then navigation is paramount and supreme. The Nation has a perfect right and complete and exclusive jurisdiction for navigation and for no other purpose. For all other purposes we must look to the States. This general statement of governmental power and the apportionment of that power between State and Nation is supported by a torrent of decisions, and among them I would refer to Martin v. Waddill (16 Pet., 367), Pollard v. Hagan (13 How., 212), Barney v. Keokuk (94 U. S., 324), McCready v. Virginia (94 U. S., 391), Parker v. Bird (137 U. S., 661), Hadrin v. Jordan (140 U. S., 371), Shively v. Bowlby (152 U. S., 1), St. Anthony Power Co. v. Water Commissioners (168 U. S., 349), United States v. Chandler-Dunbar Co. (209 U. S., 447), Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 58).

In the last-named case the court said:

> The Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers; that it has no inherent powers of sovereignty; that the enumeration of the powers granted is to be found in the Constitution of the United States, and in that alone; that the manifest purpose of the tenth amendment to the Constitution is to put beyond dispute the proposition that all powers not granted are reserved to the people, and that if in the changes of the years further powers ought to be possessed by Congress they must be obtained by a new grant from the people. While Congress has general legislative jurisdiction over the Territories and may control the flow of waters in their streams, it has no power to control a like flow within the limits of a State except to preserve or improve the navigability of the stream; that the full control over those waters is, subject to the exception named, vested in the State.

Again, in Illinois v. People (146 U. S., 387) this comprehensive language occurs:

> It is the settled rule of this country that the ownership of, and dominion and sovereignty over, lands covered by tidewaters within the limits of the several States belong to the respective States within which they are found, and with the consequent right to use or dispose of any portion thereof when that can be done without substantial impairment of the interest of the public in the waters, and subject always to the paramount right of Congress to control their navigation so far as may be necessary for the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the States. This doctrine has often been announced by this court and is not questioned by counsel of any of the parties.

So, Mr. Chairman, I submit that the overwhelming weight of authority, attested by the Supreme Court, the appellate courts of the States, and the undying names of great text writers, is, to the effect that under the commerce clause of the Constitution the Federal Government acquires no property or proprietary interests whatever in navigable rivers or in their beds. The title to the use of such waters and beds or soil thereunder remains in the States unimpaired. For the National Government, under the pretense of regulation, to appropriate such waters and soil, or the revenues therefrom, is a bald confiscation of the property of the States, property under their complete control, save only so far as such control may affect or interfere with navigation. The Federal Government has the perfect right to regulate and control navigation, but the accepted law of a century denies to Congress the right to sell or lease this power of regulation. To do so is a plain abnegation of sovereignty.

Mr. Chairman, I beg to submit in this connection, however archaic the suggestion, that federal republics have never gone to pieces unless the central authority absorbed the jurisdiction of the communal or state governments, or unless the communities or states absorbed the constitutional powers of the federal entity. The hope and the genius of our system consist in the better balancing and adjustment of these two powers and jurisdictions than ever before accomplished by man. Grote sounded the beneficence of "constitutional morality," and the admonition may well be heeded to-day in our beloved Republic. Principles should not yield to temporary desires. The test is not the hurrying cry of the hour.

generated by the dam mentioned in this case was an incident to the improvement of navigation and was subject to the control and appropriation by the United States; but such control and appropriation was not based upon the fact that it was a navigation dam or that the water power was an incident to navigation. The real judgment of the case rests expressly upon the argument that by reason of certain conveyances from the private owners of the water power in question to the United States, which conveyances were confirmed by State legislation, both the private right and the right of the State had passed to the United States as the sole proprietary owner. Therefore the United States in this case had not only her sovereign right of navigation, but the sovereign right of the State and the property right of the riparian owner. So, too, in the case of Kaukauna Co. v. Green Bay (142 U. S., 254) the commerce clause was not involved. In this case the controversy was between the State and the riparian owner, and the facts afford no sufficient analogy to support a conclusive argument in behalf of this amendment.

But, Mr. Chairman, the Chandler-Dunbar case is believed to be conclusive by very sincere gentlemen upon this floor. This company, in pursuance of a revocable consent of the Government, established in St. Marys River wings or structures whereby much of the water of this river was diverted and employed as water power by this company. The Government found it necessary to control and use the whole of the water used by this company and of this river for the purpose of making the same navigable. The Government did not assert by the faintest suggestion any proprietary rights in the river. It simply contended that the grant made to the Chandler-Dunbar Co. was revocable whenever the United States should properly declare that the structures of this company in the river affected or obstructed navigation. Congress not only declared that such structures were an obstruction to navigation, but, as I have before stated, declared all of the waters and bed of the river were necessary for navigation. So the Government declined to pay the Chandler-Dunbar Co.'s claim for damages resulting from the withdrawal of water power by the United States in the exercise of its power to regulate navigation, because such structures were put into the river in subordination to the paramount and sovereign right of the Government to remove or destroy them in the interest of navigation. The point, however, was the twelfth section of the act, passed upon in this case, which declared that the conservation of the flow of the river was—primarily for the benefit of navigation and incidentally for the purpose of having the water power developed, either for the direct use of the United States or by lease * * * through the Secretary of War.

The court held that inasmuch as the primary purpose, namely, navigation, was legitimate it could—see no sound objection to leasing any excess of power over the needs of the Government—and cited to sustain this conclusion the Kaukauna Co.-Green Bay case, which I have heretofore mentioned. But the committee is asked to bear in mind that in the Kaukauna Co.-Green Bay case the State of Wisconsin erected the dam and necessarily had every right and control thereof save when exercised in conflict with the authority of the United States as respects navigation. Indeed, I would urge upon the committee the following language of the Kaukauna-Green Bay case, quoted by Mr. Justice Lurton in the Chandler-Dunbar case, namely:

As there is no need of the surplus running to waste, there was nothing objectionable in permitting the State to let out the use of it to private parties, and thus reimburse itself for the expense of the improvement.

Thus in the Kaukauna-Green Bay case the United States approved of the right of a State to lease surplus water power to the extent of reimbursing itself for the expenses incident to the improvement or plant. In this connection I submit to the committee that the amendment does not contemplate that the United States shall lease the surplus water power for the purpose of reimbursing itself for any expense it may have incurred or may incur by reason of the operation of the locks or other improvements incident to navigation. And, further, in this connection I desire to urge that in President Taft's veto message of the Coosa River Dam he mainly based his objection to the bill upon the ground that it did not provide that the compensation for the use of surplus water power—should be applied strictly to the improvement of navigation in the respective streams—a strictly Federal function.

Thus the Chandler-Dunbar case seems to confirm by argument the position of President Taft, namely, that should leases be made of water power the income derived therefrom should not accrue to the Government as revenue but should be applied to the maintenance and improvement of the navigation involved in the particular enterprise. Therefore, by inevitable negation, the Federal Government has no right to make leases except to the extent that the compensation exacted shall be directly applied to the maintenance and improvement of navigation. Moreover, it does not appear in the Chandler-Dunbar case that the State of Michigan, in whose territory the waters in question were situated, was made a party to the proceedings or in any wise objected to the procedure. I submit that if the State of Michigan had been made a party to the proceedings and had interposed her objection it is exceedingly doubtful that the Supreme Court would have handed down the specific judgment rendered in this case. I say this because in the Chandler-Dunbar case the court distinctly held that this company could not—be heard to object to the selling of any excess of water power which may result from the construction of such controlling or remedial works as shall be found advisable for the improvement of navigation, inasmuch as it had no property right in the river which had been "taken."

Therefore it is manifest that the proper parties were not before the court to raise the vital question contained in this amendment, namely, the authority and jurisdiction of the State.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. If that is not sufficient, we will give the gentleman more time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CLINE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Certainly.

Mr. CLINE. I understand that the gentleman's position is that the United States has no proprietary interest in the water?

Mr. MONTAGUE. No proprietary interest in the water; none.

Mr. CLINE. But in the Rio Grande case, in One hundred and seventy-fourth United States, the court held that the United States had jurisdiction and power over the water, to the very last drop that fell on the mountains, sufficient to control navigation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not controvert that decision. I rely upon it as one of the many of the few cases I have cited sustaining my contention.

Mr. CLINE. As a result, so far as the practical application of the proprietorship or control of the water is concerned, is there no distinction between the jurisdictional rights and the proprietary rights?

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is a very wide distinction between the jurisdictional or sovereign right and the proprietary right. The proprietary rights of the United States are mainly similar to the property rights of riparian owners, and such property rights of the United States in many States may be condemned by the laws of the State. Moreover, the proprietary rights of riparian lands owned by the United States must be governed in the main as similar property rights of private riparian owners are governed.

But to return to the Chandler-Dunbar case, I submit that it is bottomed altogether upon the one right of the United States in navigable waters, namely, the right granted by the Constitution to control their use for the purpose of commerce or navigation. The control of waters for such purpose, plainly defined by the Constitution, is widely different from the control of navigable waters for the purpose of revenue.

The wide difference, the vast distinction, between the exercise of Federal power to protect and promote navigation and the power to raise revenue from the sale of water power not belonging to the United States in connection therewith should be carefully considered by the committee. To concede the employment of regulation of navigation as an authorization for revenue may lead us into a labyrinth from which we will never be able to extricate ourselves. If the United States sells this excess of water power for the generation of electricity, for transportation, manufacturing and industrial purposes, we have embarked upon an uncharted sea. If we sell this power, we can control the very business using the power. If we control this excess water power, we may sooner or later be compelled to own and operate these commercial enterprises. I do not now say whether such exercise of power is good or bad, wise or unwise. I am only directing your attention to the conclusion that when the day comes for the United States, under the commerce clause, to lay its hands upon the waters of the States and to sell the same for commercial purposes, that day marks the extension of the powers of the Federal Government to a degree never dreamed of by the founders of this Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to weary the House. I would, however, recapitulate my arguments. We are now dealing with a section of this bill plainly supported by the constitutional authority to regulate commerce or navigation. I do not believe the constitutional right to regulate commerce or navigation carries with it the right to levy revenue upon water power unless such returns are directly necessary for the purposes of navigation. These water powers, sold for private commercial uses, may be taxed, I concede, but they should be taxed by the States. Moreover, the National Government, even as a matter of policy, should not exclude such property values from the taxing power of the several States.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman give us the constitutional authority that the Government has to sell surplus water to reimburse itself?

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the gentleman will permit, my personal opinion as a lawyer is that the Government has no water power to sell, and therefore it has no authority to charge for that which it does not possess. [Applause.] This has been the recognized law, as I have endeavored to argue, for a hundred years, as shown by the unbroken decisions of our Supreme Court, save the decisions which I have mentioned, which, in my opinion, do not afford such an analogy as to justify a reversal of the polity and the law of many generations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended one minute in order that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks that the time of the gentleman from Virginia be extended. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to ask the gentleman, where is the tremendous danger to the Government, where is the wide departure from what has been its policy heretofore, in making a grant to a company to create a water power on a navigable stream, putting certain conditions of building on it and giving the same grant with an additional condition that it shall pay something to the Government? If the Government in getting money from the grantee is entering on socialism, why is it not socialism in the other instance?

Mr. MONTAGUE. In one instance the Government regulates navigation. In the other the Government charges for the water power of the States to conduct or aid the private individual business, which is as far afield as it would be for the Government to go into the railroad or other business.

Mr. SHERLEY. In each instance the company is using the same water and making the same sort of power and selling it for the same purpose, but in one instance Uncle Sam gets the money and in the other he does not.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In one instance the United States is regulating commerce; in the other instance the United States is taking the property of the citizens or of the State and employing it in defiance of the Constitution for the administration of private commerce. As a constitutional principle the exercise of such governmental power is unfounded, in my judgment; and the exercise of such power in aid of business and industrial enterprise will not only deprive the State of its own property, but will be perhaps in the end a disastrous industrial and economic policy.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this amendment and hope it will be adopted, as public policy and public justice require it. It is a strange doctrine that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] invokes here to-day. He contends for an anomalous proposition; one, in my judgment, that can not be sustained. In other words, the school to which he belongs says that this Government has the constitutional right to give away the most valuable property that it has, and yet it has not the constitutional right to charge for it or to sell the property. It has the power to lease without compensation, but not the power to lease for a compensation. If this Government has the right to give property away, it has the right to sell that property, because it requires no greater right to exercise a gift than it does to fulfill a sale. The same elements of power are required in either event. But gentlemen say that there is danger of socialism in the adoption of this proposition. Socialism! That has been a great bugaboo in this country for many years, and has been made to do overtime. It is invoked on almost every occasion where special privilege attempts to extend its existence. What is socialistic about the Government raising revenue from the leasing of its property, charging a fair return for making valuable grants? If the Government has the power to tax the people of this country to build dams in aid of navigation, it has the power to charge those who get the benefit of the building of the dams and make a commercial product out of the by-products in order to reimburse the Government and to relieve the taxpayer of the Government from further and higher taxation. If the Government has the power to make a grant, to give away the public property, it has the power to charge for the leasing of the property, and may impose terms for the same. Supposing the States do own the beds of the rivers. The Government controls and has dominion over the water that flows over the beds of the rivers, and it exercises dominion; and as long as it exercises that power, it has the right to charge for the exercise of that dominion and the control of the products occasioned therefrom. If it has the power, which all concede, to exercise in the one case, it necessarily follows that it has it in the other.

Here is a valuable property. It is about the only known asset of this Government which has not already been exploited, and here is an attempt to deprive the Government of the most valuable asset it has left without compensation.

The same specious argument is made in the gift of this property to-day that was made 60 years ago in giving away the public domain to the great railroad corporations of the country. It was then said that the railroads would not build through that great empire of the West unless the public encouraged them, and Congress yielded to that alluring plea and gave away the most valuable known asset of the Government, and it has been the work of 50 years to have forfeited the lands which were unearned, so improvidently granted by that unwise legislation and restored to the public domain. Here is this valuable asset, worth more than that was. Certain interests in this country to-day control the transportation and the available fuel supply of the country. Give it now, as is here proposed, for nothing, the water power of this country, and it has the business of the country by the throat. [Applause.] It is a powerful interest, and when once in control of these three essentials it will be able to dominate the entire business of the country. This is the only link out of their chain, and we, as the representatives of the American people, should see to it that this valuable asset is not frittered away here without compensation to the Government. Capital is always seeking investment. It will go where it will bring back a profitable return, and when the business of the country in any locality requires it, capital will be invested in the building of the water powers, as it has been in the building of the railroads through different parts of the country. But in order to lure capital to invest in the building up of these powers, we are not required to give to them as a reward the greatest asset that this country to-day owns, namely, the undeveloped water power of the rivers of the country. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, it is said here that these great properties will remain dormant if the Government attempts to make a charge for them; that capital will not be invested in them for that reason; and to insert this proposition in this bill will only retard this great improvement. All who indulge in that argument mistake the true situation, and the facts will not sustain them. The men who desire these properties are trying here in this legislation to drive a good bargain, and may use that argument to aid their cause and secure advantage, but the argument is not well founded. For years they have been trying to get concessions from Congress to build dams, but because of a disagreement over this question between Congress and the Executives they have been unable to get authority to do so.

President Roosevelt vetoed bills passed by Congress because they did not contain authority for compensation to the public for the valuable right; President Taft did the same; and that is the reason dams have not been built and these properties developed. Both of these Presidents contended—and very properly so, in my judgment—that the public should have remuneration for the disposition of these valuable rights, and in that position I believe the American people approve their course. Just why the public should give away these valuable properties I am unable to comprehend.

But it has been asserted here we have no constitutional right to charge a tax for these properties, and hence are powerless to so legislate. This proposition to charge for this right is in no sense a tax. It does not come within the definition of a tax. It is the consideration named and paid as a part of the agreement for a right to use them. It is a voluntary act on the part of the person or company which obtains the right. No one is compelled to enter into the agreement. He can make it or let it alone. It is optional on his part. This element clearly distinguishes from a tax, which is always compulsory. Hence it is in no sense a tax. It is merely a consideration expressed in the agreement and enforceable only as such. The public or Government is one of the parties to the contract, and as principal it instructs its agent, the Secretary of War, the terms to be inserted as a part of the contract. The whole matter for which we contend is plausible, practical, and justifiable, and in the interest of a sound public policy, one the country will approve and time will demonstrate its wisdom. Public interests require that every provision in this measure be carefully scrutinized and adequately safeguarded, that the public may not suffer as the years go by and development works its wonders.

We must not forget the fact that we are enacting legislation of vast importance not only to the people of to-day, but for people 40 and 50 years from now. Who is there that would attempt to draw a picture fairly and truly portraying conditions as they will really be 50 years hence? The most of us will not live to see them; others will take our places. Let us then not burden or even embarrass them with improvident and unjustifiable action now.

If the development of the last 25 years is to be used as a criterion for the next 25 years, what a great change; marvelous improvement will witness the conditions which will then exist, and how much greater will it be at the end of 50 years from to-day. We are moving by leaps and bounds. The ingenuity of man is taxed as never before, and it is responding as was never known before to meet every requirement made upon it. Electricity is in its infancy. Already what we have seen and know of it prepares us to expect greater strides in its development in the future than we have witnessed in the past. The ingenuity of man is opening the storehouse of science, revealing the hidden secrets, as time and conditions make requisitions for the advancement of the human race and the betterment of conditions, in order that an industrious and enlightened people may enjoy the fruits of their possessions and enhance the purposes of their existence. Nature's storehouse is filled with riches to supply every valuable purpose, but to profit by and enjoy these natural gifts we are required to husband them and employ them in a wise and conservative way and prudently enjoy them, that we may realize their real value. If we waste them, injury will ensue, because of our improvidence. Nature furnished the opportunities for these great properties. The larger portion of them have remained dormant, because necessity has not required their improvement; but as population increases, fuel becomes scarce or expensive, necessity for production increases, their values become apparent, and their development essential. If there is some demand to-day for this, who can approximate the urgent necessity which will exist 50 years from now? This fact should impress us with the imperative necessity for the exercise of caution in what we shall do now and here, in order that generations to follow us will have their rights preserved and the way for their advancement made easy and free of embarrassment. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, there are two or three points to which I should like to call the especial attention of the committee. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] based all of his arguments upon the statement that the bill before the House provided for an adequate regulation of the water powers developed under the provisions of the bill. Yet nearly all of his argument the other day was devoted to showing that these water powers would be used for private manufacturing purposes and not for public-service corporations, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], who knows a great deal about this water-power business, declares that, in his judgment, at least 50 per cent of the water power would be used for private manufacturing purposes and not for public-service corporations. This means that for over half of the power you give away there is absolutely no possibility of regulation either by the National Government or the State government, and in the bill as drafted no possibility of compensation of any kind to the Government. So that regulation as provided for in this bill is not ample protection to the public.

I want now to discuss for a moment the Chandler-Dunbar case, which the gentlemen who are opposed to any charge at all do not seem to like and regret that the Supreme Court ever handed down. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that it was a unanimous opinion of the court. That case decided absolutely that the riparian owner of a navigable stream owns no water power as against the National Government. That is what it decided, and the Supreme Court said so in so many words. The Chandler-Dunbar people owned the land on the river. They were riparian owners and they had a plant developed, and the Government came in and put in a dam for navigation purposes, which destroyed the whole value of their property. The Supreme Court of the United States held that the Government did not have to pay them 1 cent as compensation, because, in the words of the court, it had taken nothing from the Chandler-Dunbar Co. which it owned.

Mr. Chairman, I will make two statements that no man on the other side can contradict, and one is that no dam can be built in a navigable stream without the consent of the Government, and the second proposition is that the Government itself may build a dam in aid of navigation, and all water power developed thereby belongs to it; and it shall pay not 1 cent for compensation, and it can lease, sell, and use that water power for any purpose under heaven that it wants to. That is the law, and I challenge any gentleman on the other side to deny that statement of law, as laid down in the Chandler-Dunbar case.

And then they tell us that we can not do, through an agent, through a private corporation to whom we grant this right, what we can do ourselves; that we can not get a cent of revenue from it or put any charge upon it without being unconstitutional. The gentlemen who make that statement, without exception, do not believe in public ownership. They do not believe in the conservation of the water power of this country. This is not a conservation bill. A little mixture of the doctrine of State rights and the doctrine of private ownership of water powers with a little State regulation stirred up together never will produce a Federal conservation act that will satisfy the people of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, at least two or three speakers have spoken in favor of the amendment, and in all fairness the amendment at this time ought to be opposed. I wish to rise right now, in order to contradict practically every statement, both as to law and facts, made by my good friend from New Hampshire, and he knows how very highly I regard him. I will read what the Chandler-Dunbar case itself states, and that ought to be the best answer to his statements and arguments:

> This title of the owner of fast land upon the shore of a navigable river to the bed of the river is at best a qualified one. It is a title which inheres in the ownership of the shore and, unless reserved or excluded by implication, passed with it as a shadow follows a substance, although capable of distinct ownership. It is subordinate to the public right of navigation, and, however helpful in protecting the owner against the acts of third parties, is of no avail against the exercise of the great and absolute power of Congress over the improvement of navigable rivers. That power of use and control comes from the power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations. It includes navigation, and subjects every navigable river to the control of Congress. All means having some positive relation to the end in view which are not forbidden by some other provision of the Constitution are admissible.

That is the extent of it, that the riparian owner owns the bed of the river——

Mr. McCOY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I can not just now. And such ownership is subordinate to the public right of navigation. That is all the right the United States has—the paramount right of navigation, not any property right of ownership in anything; that is continued in the riparian owner. Now, the Chandler-Dunbar case laid down this doctrine—that that private company owned the riparian rights. As a part of such ownership, it owned the title to the bed of the stream, under the law of the State of Michigan. The water that passed over it was not its property. Nobody has ever claimed that it was. I stated last night, I stated to-day, and I state now that the ownership of that water is not in any private individual, and it is not in the United States either. There is not one single decision in any United States court, of any State court, of any respectable attorney, who has ever claimed that the United States has a single particle of ownership or proprietorship in the water or, equally, that any private individual has any ownership in the water or any other right than its use. Whatever ownership there is would be in the State itself, in trust for the public use under its own rules, subject only to the paramount right of the United States to use it for navigation only. No case has ever contradicted this doctrine, and the Chandler-Dunbar case only restates it. Now, gentlemen must remember the only right whatever under the Chandler-Dunbar case the United States has is the right to use the bed of that river between the banks from high-water mark and the water which flows over such submerged land for the purposes of commerce. That is all the right it has or can have unless it buys and pays for it. Now, without any such proprietory right, you here attempt to tax an individual only or to sell something you do not own. That is the difficulty with you gentlemen.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Does not the Chandler-Dunbar case expressly decide that all water power developed by that dam, if built for navigation purposes, belongs to the Government?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; it does not; not at all. All it says is this, that the excess power not needed for navigation from a future dam constructed for navigation under authority of Congress, owned by the Government, may be sold; and that is exactly what we have been contending for. Such excess power arose not from works of the Chandler-Dunbar Co., but of the United States, and in such case could be sold by the Government.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. What is the distinction the gentleman makes between the case where the Government builds the dam and sells the excess water power, and where it gives to somebody else the privilege of building the same sort of dam for the same purpose, to aid in navigation, and charges such grantee for the rights of the excess water?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. This is the distinction, and this only: When the United States builds the dam itself for the purpose of navigation, it exercises its sovereign power under the commerce clause. If it creates property there for a public purpose in the use of its property wherever an excess of water results which may be used for power, it may sell the use of its own property. This is provided by the Constitution as one of the powers and duties of Congress to have charge of the property of the United States. Where the United States has no property rights, then it only had the right to control navigation, and that is a sovereign right, and right there I want to contradict another statement of my friend. For 100 years a man could put up a dam on a navigable stream and no Federal authority did attempt to interfere. It was not until the act of 1899, I think it was, that provided that no dam should be constructed in a navigable stream without the consent of Congress. Up to that time a man could construct all the dams he wanted to put up and take all the chances he wanted to in a navigable stream under authority of the States or otherwise, and if it was an obstruction to navigation, he was not violating any law, and nobody bothered him. Since that time, of course, where Congress has expressly required its assent, no dam can be constructed unless expressly authorized by Congress. But to get back to this point where Congress has itself given a person a right or authority to obstruct a stream——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will ask for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Where that is done this man is not an agent of the United States; not an agent at all of the United States. We make a contract right with him or give him our consent or authority; call it whatever you please.

That contract right, as I have already stated this afternoon, within the limits of affecting commerce, within the limits of the commerce clause of the Constitution, allows certain things to be done—gives him the right to create certain property rights. Those are his property rights, just the same as though the United States owned the dam and had its property rights. Now, when the owner of that dam has his property rights, he should have the usufruct from it, just the same as where, if the United States owns its dam, it should have the usufruct from it, because the United States is the owner of the property, and this applicant for the dam is the owner of his property. In the case the United States does not act as the sovereign, it acts as an individual. Whenever the United States does not exercise its sovereignty for the purpose of regulating commerce and selling water power merely as an incident, it acts not as a sovereign, but as an individual, and the rights of individuals govern its acts, not the rights of the sovereign. Consequently when an individual constructs a dam under authority of Congress, and he is entitled to its use and profits, subject only to the paramount right for navigation, he is not a partner, and can not be a partner, with the United States, because the United States contributes nothing to the partnership. It can charge him for its services and property, but flowing water is not its property. If it wants more money from him it must tax him under the taxing powers of the Government. If it attempts to do more, or get money any other way, it is an invasion of the constitutional rights of the citizen—takes his property without compensation for public use, and without due process of law—and in addition is clearly, to me, a violation of the powers of Congress in raising its revenues by taxation. This owner of the dam must pay the taxes of the locality, whatever they may be. Water power costs from $150 to $300 per horsepower to create, and the cost of the land, the flowage right for lands alone, including the side and transmission lines, averages about $10 an acre. The average assessment on the whole property would probably be $100 to $150 a horsepower, and the average rate of taxation, according to the census, would be about 1 per cent more, so that the local tax would be a little over a dollar per horsepower per year right now. In addition to that, whatever additional right the State has to tax may be added on the water power. In addition to that, the corporation, or whatever it may be, pays a tax of 1 per cent on its gross earnings to the Federal Government under the corporation-tax law which Congress passed. So there are two or three taxes right now. In addition to that, there are three different kinds of charges provided in this bill, the charges of investigation and service by the Government, charges for the use of various classes of its property; and all those things are charged against water power.

The steamboat owner using identically that same water is not charged anything except the ordinary local tax. If he happens to be a corporation, he pays the same corporation tax as the water-power man. But he does not pay one cent more. You charge the water-power men a tax which you do not charge to some man that uses the same water if he happens to run a steamboat. I submit that, outside of the constitutional power, it is not a fair constitutional or economic proposition. No other country so discriminates. Canada and Norway tax less than half, I think probably only a quarter, of what we do now. Yet you propose to double this burden.

Now, you gentlemen talk about the water powers being worth so much. Let me cite you an instance right under your own noses, here in Washington. Ever since I have been in Congress we have wondered why the Great Falls water power has not been improved. The testimony before the National Waterways Commission showed why it has not been improved. The riparian rights at Great Falls necessary for water-power generation are owned by the same people who own the power plant here, and they told us, and their testimony is of record, that the reason they did not improve it was because they could produce the power cheaper and more advantageously with coal right here in the District; that it would not pay to improve it under existing circumstances. The result is that the water power at Great Falls—12,000 minimum horsepower—is running to the sea, and will run forever to the sea under the changes you gentlemen are making. Here in Washington that power ought to be improved. That natural resource should be conserved. Yet you propose to make it impossible, in the name of conservation. It never will be improved under the method which you gentlemen are adopting this afternoon. There is no need to prophesy. Here is a concrete instance before your own eyes.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Every gentleman who has addressed the committee on this subject has the right to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] failed to get in his remarks during the general debate, and I hope he will be treated liberally as to time.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Oklahoma ask for?

Mr. FERRIS. Ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, if this were a debate only as to the mere policy of fixing a Government charge, I would not consume the time of the committee about what I have in mind. But when it comes to debating whether or not we have the legal right, I think every man who feels keenly about it ought to rise to his feet, to the end that this House may not go off beside the question. As to whether or not the Federal Government has the right to lay down as a condition precedent under which they have the right to construct dams and manufacture water power, I think the right to do so is undoubted and forever settled. The Chandler-Dunbar case, decided in 1913, passed on this question and makes waste paper of all the endless debate between constitutional lawyers on the subject. To my mind that case settles the paramountcy of the case in the Federal Government once and for all. Inasmuch as this matter is under the War Department, I want to submit so good an authority on the subject as the Secretary of War himself. He writes a letter, and it appears in the hearings under the date of February 19, 1914, to the chairman of the committee, and says on this identical question:

Legally speaking, I do not think there can be any dispute with respect to the question of power. The position of the Federal Government is—paramount. Nothing can be done without its consent—

What?—

The Secretary of War has more eloquently put this question than I ever heard it before. Hear what he says, for he says it well:

Nothing can be done without its consent, and only that can be done to which it does consent. There is no justification for a policy of do nothing. Therefore the question is, What is the wise policy to adopt that something may be done?

It goes on in the same logical way all through.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, the Federal Government has the right to permit or withhold the permit for the construction of any dam in navigable water. I assert the Federal Government has the right to construct, anywhere, any place, any sort of a dam it desires to construct, in the navigable waters of the United States. I assert it has the power to destroy any dam, to remove any dam, existing in the navigable waters of the United States. Surely, if the Federal Government has first the right to construct, first the right to create, and, second, the right to destroy, what sane, thinking man, be he lawyer or layman, can say they have not the right of fixing the condition under which they may enjoy the use of this dam?

This question has been a football ever since water-power debates began, but now that the courts have settled the matter—and I submit they have the last say—the rest of us had better turn from the legal phase of it and deal with the policy of the matter.

The act itself, the existing law, says that the Federal Government may fix such conditions as it elects to fix, and surely this is but one of them. But, sweeping aside for the moment, and admitting for the moment that what the constitutional lawyers say on the subject is that we can not impose this power, I say that when, according to the Sherley amendment, the condition is fixed as a condition precedent which the power company must assume and must accept before it can go forward, it makes a contract between the grantee and the Federal Government that takes the case entirely out of dispute.

But there are so many other authorities on the subject that I will not in my short time try to present them. Ex-Secretary Fisher is a lawyer of no mean ability. He is a man who has given years of study to this question, and when he appeared before the House Committee on Public Lands he went on and showed that the question of our legal right so to do is no longer one even worthy of momentary debate. He showed that it is one of policy and a question of what we should do.

Granted at least for my own purposes, and granted that we have the right to charge, I want to pass on to the qustion of policy in doing it. To my mind, Mr. Chairman, this question of revenue or a fixing of charges is not the most important part of this bill. To my mind, this is not the feature that ought to engage the most careful scrutiny and judgment. It is true that the principle is one of the important features, but personally I would like to see the Sherley amendment modified. I would like to see it for the present either impose a nominal charge or provide for only enough to pay for operating expenses, so that we might preserve the principle without impairment and still have larger development. I am not keenly concerned with the revenue feature, and I think a careful reading and a careful investigation of the subject will disclose that the chief question regarding this amendment is not one to raise revenue; at least, that is not the question that now concerns me. Why? Because, Mr. Chairman, only from 10 to 20 per cent of the total water-power potentiality of the country has so far been developed. Some 80 or 90 per cent yet remains undeveloped, yet dormant. For that reason I am not anxious at all, nor do I believe it is the fundamental or deep-seated question in this bill, to see how much we can get out of these projects, because I want to see development go forward. While I am equally anxious that the House to-day does not turn its back on the principle, on the clear and unequivocal right of the Government to make a charge to-morrow, next day, or next week, or next year, or years hereafter, if it desires to, for water power generated by reason of dams either on the navigable or nonnavigable waters of the United States.

Seventy-two per cent of the water power of the country is out in the public-land States of the West, and if the House will indulge me for a moment I will tell you where the potential water power of this country is located. In the North Atlantic States there are 2,200,000 horsepower, or 7 per cent of the aggregate. In the South Atlantic States there are 3,200,000 horsepower, or 8 per cent. In the North Central group of States there are 1,700,000 horsepower, or less than 6 per cent of the aggregate. In the South Central States there are 1,500,000 horsepower, or 5.3 per cent of the aggregate. In the Western States there are 7,300,000 horsepower, or 72.6 per cent of the aggregate.

Some one in this debate has said that "we have no right or power to charge," and "nobody ever heard of charging until the Chandler-Dunbar case was decided." Why, the greatest development of the country in the West is water power, and they have all been paying a royalty or charge. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but still contending that this is not the most vital part of this bill, we certainly should not go off on a tangent or think for a moment that we have not the power to do it. Every other water-power country does it. I again assert we have the full right to do it. It is only a question of how much we will do, to the end that we may not ward off or retard development. Personally I am in favor of a very low rate. Secretary Fisher, when he appeared before our committee, stated that he was in favor of a very low rate. Secretary Lane asserts the same thing—that he is in favor of a very low rate—and Gifford Pinchot asserts the same thing. But each one of them wants the principle preserved unimpaired. The letter of the Secretary of War is so clear as to what the Federal Government has the right to do that surely no one can go far wrong in accepting his conclusions.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. What does the gentleman mean by the impairment of the principle?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not want the House to agree to it that we have no right to charge water-power companies for the water power that they get under these grants. This legislation may be held by future courts as a precedent, and some court in the future may take these discussions and upon them base some decision or something that might seem to amount to a holding on what is said here. The intent of Congress always plays its part, and I personally do not want Congress to—even during this debate—go off on the wrong track. The Federal Government is paramount in these matters, and I shrink to see her rights assaulted, even momentarily. We deal with a matter here to-day that is large enough for our best minds. It is the question of questions; it is the people's question, and anything short of intelligent action will soon live to plague us.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not think there is anything in the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] which impairs that.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, surely not. I did not assert that. I merely feared the amendment might be so worded that it would impose upon the Secretary of War the duty to charge the highest possible rate he could secure and thereby ward off the development and corresponding reduction in price of power that we all are striving for, that was all. The gentleman did not grasp my meaning, perhaps due to my inability to make myself clear.

Mr. SHERLEY. The danger is more than in the discussion. You are proposing a bill here—a bill to grant 50-year leases. If you put this bill through without some such amendment, you may have denied to the Government for 50 years the right to make the charge.

Mr. FERRIS. Of course, I am not putting this bill through at all. I agree with the gentleman that this is a 50-year proposition. But while it is wholly beside this amendment, that is not too long a time. We interrogated every water-power engineer and every water-power authority who appeared before our committee, and every one of them said that for the purpose of development they ought to have a 50-year term, and I personally believe they should have a maximum of 50 years. But at the end of 50 years their heads ought to go on the block, and they ought to initiate any additional negotiations rather than have some kind of a proposition to get it back, we know not when or how.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. The property in this water has been held to be not in the riparian owner. It is claimed to be not in the United States. In the case of a stream between two States, where would the property right be?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, an interstate question often arises immediately after the power is generated. That is the necessity of forever keeping the Federal Government paramount in power. For instance, transmission lines carry the power across State lines. Water power generated in Wyoming is at once used in Colorado. Here State control is ineffective and of no avail.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman will probably get my point of difficulty. It does seem to me from the Constitution that the right of the United States Government in natural waters is an easement rather than a proprietary right in the water; still I am puzzled to know where the right to the water in the river is between two States.

Mr. FERRIS. I think I can use a homely illustration and state where it is. The Federal Government owns the eye in the needle, without which the needle is of little service. The Federal Government owns the right to give or withhold the right to construct a dam, without which there is no dam or power, without which there may or may not be navigation. The Federal Government has the right to destroy or renew every structure placed in every navigable stream of the country. Then, granted the Federal Government has both power to create and destroy, surely it has the lesser right of regulation in the interest of the public for whom the Government acts. But, again repeating, even if constitutional lawyers justly differed upon the subject, the Chandler-Dunbar case, carefully read by careful lawyers, does not confuse the subject, but goes squarely to the point and, as I believe, settles it once and for all.

Too many theories and fine-spun points have too long been injected into these debates. Now that the Chandler-Dunbar case has left us free to act, has swept away the seeming cobwebs, it is our duty to do our full duty with naught but the public interest in mind.

Mr. LEVY, Mr. LINDBERGH, and Mr. ADAMSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the chairman of the committee desire recognition?

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no disposition to interfere with gentlemen who want to speak. I only wanted to ask whether we could reach any arrangement to bring the debate to a close. I will not make any suggestion until the gentlemen have spoken.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, for the past three years this subject of power rights in navigable streams has been before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and we are thoroughly conversant with the questions involved.

The Federal authority is purely a sovereign power for a specific public use, and does not carry with it any proprietary sovereign right except to control navigation. This proposition is well settled by numerous decisions of the United States Supreme Court. They are in harmony with the decisions of the highest court of the State of New York.

The leading case on the subject, and which holds the principles above outlined, is Martin v. Waddell (16 Pet., 367). The court there held that when the American Revolution was concluded the people of each State became sovereign, and in that character held the absolute right to all their navigable waters and the soils under them, for their own common use, subject only to the rights since surrendered by the Constitution to the General Government. This right, as pointed out by the court, was the right to regulate commerce between the several States and foreign nations.

In Pollard v. Hagan (3 How., 212) it was held that the shores of navigable waters and the soils under them were not granted by the Constitution of the United States, but were reserved to the States respectively. That was an Alabama case, and the court held, in addition to the above principle, that the new States had the same rights, sovereignty, and jurisdiction in respect to the waters of navigable streams as the thirteen original States.

In Barney v. Keokuk (94 U. S., 324) it was decided that the rights of riparian owners on the banks of the Mississippi River were subject to control and regulation by the laws of the States within which the lands were included. The opinion in that case states that the Great Lakes and other navigable waters of the country above as well as below the flood of the tide are, in the strictest sense, entitled to the denomination of navigable waters and amenable to admiralty jurisdiction, and that there is no sound reason for further adhering to the old rule as to the proprietorship of the beds and shores of such water. The court added that the proprietorship of the beds and shores of such waters properly belongs to the States by their inherent sovereignty.

In Hardin v. Jordan (140 U. S., 371) the court said, in speaking of the title to the shore and lands under the waters of navigable streams:

> Such title being in the State, the lands are subject to State regulation and control, under the condition, however, of not interfering with the regulations which may be made by Congress with regard to public navigation and commerce.

The court further said in the above case:

> This right of the States to regulate and control the shores of tide waters and the land under them is the same as that which is exercised by the Crown in England. In this country the same rule has been extended to our great navigable lakes, which are treated as inland seas, and also, in some of the States, to navigable rivers, as the Mississippi, the Missouri, the Ohio, and in Pennsylvania to all the permanent rivers of the State, but it depends on the law of each State to what waters and to what extent this prerogative of the State over the lands under water shall be exercised.

The United States Supreme Court, in Water Power Co. v. Water Board (168 U. S., 358), reasserted the principle that, subject only to the Federal right of control, under constitutional authority to regulate commerce, that all the rights of ownership and beneficial use in the beds and waters of navigable streams pass to the State. This is also held in the following cases: St. L. v. Rutz (138 U. S., 226, 242); Kaukauna Water Power Co. v. Green Bay & Miss. Canal Co. (142 U. S., 254); St. Louis v. Myers (113 U. S., 566); Shively v. Bowlby (152 U. S., 1); Illinois Central Ry. v. Illinois (146 U. S., 387).

In the latter case the court said:

> That the State holds the title to the lands under the navigable waters of Lake Michigan, within its limits, in the same manner that the State holds title to soils under tidewater, by the common law, we have already shown, and that title necessarily carries with it control over the waters above them whenever the lands are subjected to use.

In Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 46) the United States Supreme Court covered in unmistakable language the whole subject involved in this litigation. It held that:

> The Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers; that it has no inherent powers or sovereignty; that the enumeration of the powers granted is to be found in the Constitution of the United States and in that alone; that the manifest purpose of the tenth amendment to the Constitution is to put beyond dispute the proposition that all powers not granted are reserved to the people, and that if in the changes of the years further powers ought to be possessed by Congress they must be obtained by a new grant from the people. While Congress has general legislative jurisdiction over the Territories and may control the flow of waters in their streams, it has no power to control a like flow within the limits of a State, except to preserve or improve the navigability of the stream; that the full control over those waters is, subject to the exception named, vested in the State.

The tenth amendment, to which the court refers above, is as follows:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

Nowhere in the Constitution of the United States is the Federal Government given any power other than for the purposes of commerce and navigation. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, about the only thing a great city has at the present time upon which it can exact a considerable revenue is the right to use its streets. I undertake to say that public opinion is such that if the governing body of a great city granted to a railroad company or a subway company at the present time the right to use its streets for nothing that governing body would have considerable trouble with the people who lived in that city. About the only thing the National Government has of value outside of the public land it owns at the present time is the right to use the flowing water in these navigable streams and in these streams nonnavigable on the public lands. We are asked here in this bill to absolutely surrender, now and forever, that right. I undertake to say that the surrender of the right to exact compensation for these valuable privileges sought by the water-power groups would not meet with approval in this country at the present time.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and others speaking on the other side of this question and against this proposed amendment based their opposition to it on the theory that it is a tax, and that therefore a tax of this kind would be unconstitutional; that the Government ought to get its revenue by taxation from some other source. This is not a tax. It lacks the necessary element which makes a tax. It is not compulsory. Nobody is compelled to pay it, because nobody is compelled to enter into these relations with the Government. This is merely a compensation for the privilege granted. It is a part of the consideration for the contract the National Government enters into with the individual or company seeking the right to build dams—what he pays to make use of the flowing waters where there are declivities in our navigable rivers.

It will not have any effect on the consumer of electrical power. It will not increase the cost to him, because the cost of electrical power will be controlled by the cost of steam power, and because the cost of producing steam power is always higher. The consumers of power prefer that sort of power which is the least trouble to them, the power that they can get by simply turning a button. That is more valuable and more desired by them than the power they have to get by building and maintaining fires in great furnaces. We can expect always a market for electrical power equal to the market for steam power in the zone reached by the company operating at that particular point. They will charge just as much or a little less than they charge for steam power, and if we impose this compensation upon them it will not mean that the consumer will pay any more money, but it will mean that the profits of this generating company perhaps will not be quite as large as they otherwise would be.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was perfectly frank in his statement as to the effect of this bill. He admits, as far as the construction of dams is concerned, and all other matters of like character, that this does not change the law as it has already existed, but it is a step in advance, he says, because it provides for regulation of the price to consumers, and because it holds out a glimmer of hope that 50 years from now the people who may be alive at that time can get some sort of relief from the exactions that the water-power groups of this country will try to put on them as soon as this becomes a law.

I would like for anybody to explain to me where the bill provides for any possible regulation of cost to consumers. It provides that where a current generated at one of these dams enters into interstate commerce and is consumed in another State from where it is generated, the consumer there, if he thinks he is charged too much, can complain to the Secretary of War and attempt to have the matter adjusted. But in the first place he must be able to establish the fact that his current does come from another State; and with the interchange of currents provided for in this bill, and with the interchange going on in commerce at the present time between currents generated by coal and in our navigable rivers, it is impossible for the consumer of a current in any State to know where it comes from. No man can tell from whence it comes except the omnipotent God Himself and one or two minor officials of some one of these water power companies, and you will never be able to reach them.

Fifty years from now the Government can take over the projects if it feels like taking them over. Here is what they have to do in order to recapture under this bill: At that time, if the Government elects to take over one of these dams under this bill, the Government must, first, take over all the property dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness under the franchise; second, the Government must take over all necessary property created or even merely serviceable, whether the company owns it or not, in the distribution of its power, and this would include rights of way. Then they put in an omnibus clause which requires the Government to take over all other property of value and usefulness which would be seriously impaired, whether owned by the company or not. This might be many entire manufacturing plants and a manufacturing city.

Fourth. The Government must pay the original cost of the lock or locks and all other expenses required by the United States, no matter how much it is impaired in value.

Fifth. The Government must undertake to carry out all contracts made by the company which seem to the Government to be reasonable.

Mr. Chairman, under the theory of this bill the Government might be compelled to take over nearly all of the tangible property in an entire State in order to take charge of one of these properties. If we are ready for socialism 50 years from now, then 50 years from now we may be ready for this kind of a provision in this kind of a bill. There is not any possible kind of regulation of price to the consumers here nor any possibility that even 50 years from now the people who live then can get any relief from the sort of oppression sought to be made by this bill. Every change in this bill, as has been stated so forcibly on this floor, from the original dam bill now on the statute books, is a change in the interest of water-power groups of this country and against the people. Every change made in this bill operates or is intended to operate as a subsidy to the water-power groups of this country; and this bill proposes and attempts to give to these water-power groups, fast consolidating so that there will be only three or four in the near future, the rivers of this country.

I vote for this amendment because it preserves the principle that we ought to preserve—the right to exact compensation. I vote for it because to defeat it here would be to defeat that principle. I vote for it because I believe it will result, in the near future, in the exaction of the kind of compensation these companies ought to make. In fact, I would vote for almost any amendment that could be proposed to his bill, for I can conceive of no amendment that would make it worse. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that this has been a very hot week, and that this is Saturday night, and it is now 5 o'clock.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I have been quietly permitting gentlemen to exercise their sweet will and to talk to their hearts' content. I had hoped that we would be able to end the discussion on this amendment to-night, but as three-fourths of the time has been used by the proponents of the amendment, I think that it would be fair that the opponents have some opportunity to discuss it. That would evidently keep us here too late for Saturday. I do not suppose it would be wise to attempt to make an agreement on the time of discussion this evening.

Mr. MANN. I doubt whether that would be possible.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, when we again go into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill I will propose an arrangement to end debate upon this section and the amendments and to divide the remaining time. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16053, the general dam act, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following personal requests, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ASHBROOK requests leave of absence for 20 days, on account of important business.

Mr. STEENERSON requests leave of absence for 60 days, on account of public business.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I respectfully request indefinite leave of absence, on account of illness in my family.

I. L. LENROOT.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I object to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] and to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut objects to the requests of the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Minnesota. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of making a correction in the statement that I made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, on the 12th of May, when the House had under consideration Senate bill 4553 and House bill 15503, authorizing the appointment of ambassadors to Argentina and Chile, I am quoted in the RECORD as saying: "The growing importance, politically and commercially, of the two Republics of Argentina and Chile has led their Governments to suggest to our State Department the propriety of accrediting diplomatic representatives of the highest character to those countries. Our executive department is most favorably inclined to this suggestion."

I intended to say: "The growing importance, politically and commercially, of the two Republics of Argentina and Chile has led our Government to suggest the propriety of accrediting diplomatic representatives of the highest character to those countries. Recognizing the greatness of these two South American countries, their commercial importance, and the great part they will play in the world's politics in the years to come, the President and the State Department are desirous that we accredit to these two Republics ambassadors instead of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary." I make this statement that the RECORD may be accurate.

NEW HARMONY, IND.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing in the RECORD an address delivered by my colleague [Mr. LIEB] at the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the city of New Harmony, Ind., together with a letter from the President read on that occasion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LIEB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a speech delivered by Hon. S. M. Ralston, governor of Indiana, at New Harmony, at the centennial, on Indiana day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LIEB] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an address by Gov. Ralston, of Indiana, on the same occasion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the object of inserting this speech in the RECORD?

Mr. LIEB. This is on the centennial celebration. The name of Hon. Robert D. Owen, a former Member of Congress and also a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, appears in it; but there is nothing political in it.

Mr. MANN. If it were political, I would not object, and I guess I will not object anyhow; but if we permit the printing of speeches universally delivered by individuals we will have to considerably extend the RECORD.

Mr. MURDOCK. We ought to make exceptions of Members of Congress.

Mr. MANN. I have not objected to Members of Congress, and I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned to meet on Monday, July 27, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. DIXON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2909) to extend the privileges of the seventh section of immediate-transportation act to Bay City, Mich., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1015), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9591) to permit the manufacture of denatured alcohol by mixing domestic and wood alcohol while in process of distillation, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1018), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 302) authorizing and directing the President of the United States to invite foreign Governments to participate in the celebration of the fortieth anniversary of the founding of the Washington navel orange industry, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1019), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. CARAWAY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I present a telegram from the Port of Columbia Commercial Club, port of Astoria, Oreg., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

ASTORIA, OREG., July 25, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We earnestly call your attention to the following resolutions passed unanimously at a mass meeting of the citizens of Astoria and the members of the Port of Columbia Commercial Club, held July 24, 1914. We request you to exhibit this telegram to Senators BORAH and BRADY, of Idaho; Senators JONES and POINDEXTER, of Washington; and Senators MYERS and WALSH, of Montana, and to see that the same is called to the attention of Senators BURTON, CUMMINS, KENYON, and all other oponents as well as friends of the pending rivers and harbors bill. The sentiment of the people of the Columbia Basin is practically unanimous for the passage of the rivers and harbors bill as recommended by the United States engineers. A great wrong will be done to a great region striving for development if rivers and harbors appropriations are defeated this year:

"Resolved, That we, the members of the Port of Columbia Commercial Club and citizens of Astoria, Oreg., insist on the immediate passage by the Senate of the United States of the rivers and harbors bill now pending, and hereby request the United States Senators from Oregon and their colleagues of Washington, Idaho, Montana, California, and Nevada to bend every effort to this end. Improvements of vital importance to the Pacific coast ports and inland waterways depend upon the speedy availability of the appropriations embraced in this bill.

"Resolved, That we have implicit confidence in the recommendations of the United States engineers who have given favorable reports on the various projects embraced in the pending bill, and that we go on record as favoring liberal expenditures of public money to provide water transportation for interior communities.

"Resolved, That we believe there is no 'pork' in the appropriation items relating to Pacific coast projects, and that, so far as other projects are concerned, we accept the judgment of the United States engineers, meanwhile calling the attention of the United States Senate to the fact that the River Clyde, from Glasgow to the sea, was once a shallow, unimportant stream, and possibly its improvement might once have been classed as 'pork.' It now floats millions of annual commerce.

"Resolved, That we remind our Senators that the port of Astoria is expending approximately $1,000,000 for the construction of the greatest municipal docks on the Pacific coast, that the Hill system of railroads is building ocean docks and terminals here which will cost several millions, and that the citizens of a tributary region of 300,000 square miles in area are vitally concerned in the appropriations, which shall open the Columbia River to free and uninterrupted navigation from its mouth to the interior. Also that the organization of steamboat lines to navigate said river and its tributaries depends upon the early completion of the Celilo Canal, an appropriation for which is included in said bill."

THE PORT OF COLUMBIA COMMERCIAL CLUB,
By ALFRED KINNEY, President.
E. M. CHERRY, Secretary.

We hereby concur in the above.

ASTORIA, OREG., July 26, 1914.

Hon. WESLEY JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Appreciating your former friendship for northwestern rivers and harbors, we earnestly request you to use your influence to secure passage of pending rivers and harbors bill in the United States Senate. Please see Senators CHAMBERLAIN and LANE and read resolutions telegraphed them from Astoria. Defeat of this bill would be a calamity for Pacific coast rivers and harbors, and particularly the Columbia Basin.

THE CITIZENS OF ASTORIA,
By ALFRED KINNEY,
President Port of Columbia Commercial Club.
COLUMBIA AND SNAKE RIVER WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION,
By WALLACE R. STRUBEL, Secretary.

Mr. JONES. I present a telegram from W. J. Kinney, president of the Vancouver Commercial Club, of Washington, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VANCOUVER, WASH., July 25, 1914.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Whereas it has come to the knowledge of the Vancouver Commercial Club that there is a likelihood that the rivers and harbors bill now pending in Washington, D. C., will be defeated; and

Whereas the defeat of the river and harbor bill would be of tremendous financial loss and detriment to the progress and growth of the Columbia River Basin; and

Whereas it is of great benefit to the development of the Northwest that said bill pass, and particularly such parts as are tributary to the Columbia River Basin; and

Whereas it is the sense of the Commercial Club of Vancouver, Wash., represented in public assembly that the Representatives in Congress from the State of Washington use their utmost influence toward passing the river and harbor bill as now before Congress, and that said passage be procured if at all possible immediately: Therefore be it

Resolved in public assembly at Vancouver, Wash., by the Commercial Club of said organization, That the Representatives in Congress from the State of Washington be urged to use every effort and influence possible for the passage of said bill at once, and that a copy of this resolution be sent to each Member of Congress from the State of Washington and one copy thereof placed on file in the Commercial Club records at Vancouver, Wash.

There being no objection, the petition was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

VETERAN ARMY OF THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I present a letter in the nature of a petition, which I ask may be read and that it, together with the accompanying resolutions, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The letter refers to the veterans of the Spanish War residing in Manila. As I read the letter I feel that gross and manifest injustice is being done those who are there resident.

The letter is very short, and I simply ask that it may be read and that it and the resolutions adopted by the veterans may be sent to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT
VETERAN ARMY OF THE PHILIPPINES,
UNITED SPANISH WAR VETERANS, COMMITTEE ON CIVIL SERVICE,
Manila, July 1, 1914.

Senator MARTINE:

Inclosed please find a copy of a petition and resolution adopted by the Department Veteran Army of the Philippines, United Spanish War Veterans, which is self-explanatory.

As a Member of the United States Congress, elected by the constituents of your district for the purpose of assisting in the deliberations of Congress, and thus legislate for the benefit of all Americans, within and without, we feel that we are not trespassing by forwarding this petition to you, and we ask no more of you than that you peruse the same, and after careful deliberation do what your conscience may tell you to do for the purpose of assisting those of your countrymen, who find themselves between the devil and the deep sea.

If there is any further information which this committee can give you, please write to the undersigned.

Yours, very truly,

SIDNEY C. SCHUARZKOPF, Chairman.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not ask to burden the Senate with the reading of the resolutions, but I ask that they may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter and accompanying resolutions will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12463) to authorize the withdrawal of lands on the Quinaielt Reservation, in the State of Washington, for lighthouse purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 711) thereon.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 249) for the appointment of George Frederick Kunz as a member of the North American Indian Memorial Commission, reported it without amendment.

MERRIMAC RIVER BRIDGE, LAWRENCE, MASS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 6101) to grant the consent of Congress for the city of Lawrence, County of Essex, State of Massachusetts, to construct a bridge across the Merrimac River, and I submit a report (No. 710) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the bill.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill just reported by the Senator from Texas be given immediate consideration. It is a proposition to enable the city of Lawrence to proceed with the construction of a bridge across the Merrimac River. The matter has, of course, passed through the usual processes, so far as the city government is concerned; the Legislature of Massachusetts has passed a bill authorizing the construction of the bridge, subject to the approval of the War Department, and the War Department has approved the plans and the construction as proposed. The contract has been let; the work has commenced; and the only reason this legislation is required is because the Merrimac River is navigable in two States. Therefore it was assumed that this bridge could not technically come under the general bridge act. For that reason I hope there will be no objection to the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the city of Lawrence, county of Essex, State of Massachusetts, and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Merrimac River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the foot of Amesbury Street, in the city of Lawrence, in the county of Essex, in the State of Massachusetts, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A bill (S. 6172) for the relief of Johannes T. Jensen; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. NEWLANDS:

A bill (S. 6173) granting an increase of pension to Paul de Chaine (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, it was—

Ordered, That the papers accompanying, and in support of, the bill S. 4721, Sixty-third Congress, second session, now pending before the Committee on Claims, be, and the same are hereby, withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made on said bill.

USE OF TIDAL BASIN.

Mr. NORRIS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 431), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be instructed to report to the Senate on the advisability and cost of converting the tidal basin in Potomac Park into a public bathing pool.

INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER CO. (S. DOC. NO. 558).

Mr. NELSON. I have a copy of the brief of the Government filed in the District Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota in the case of the United States Government against International Harvester Co. and others. I ask that the brief may be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LANDS IN PORT ANGELES, WASH.

Mr. JONES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5701) providing for the disposal of certain lands in block 32, in the city of Port Angeles, State of Washington. It is a measure of purely local importance, and I am satisfied it will occasion no debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 2, line 3, after the word "except," to strike out "three, to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury," and insert "lots 1, 8, 9, and 10," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That all lots in block 32, in the city of Port Angeles, State of Washington, now reserved for Government purposes under an act entitled "An act providing for the reappraisement and sale of certain lands in the town site of Port Angeles, Wash, and for other purposes," approved March 16, 1912, except lots 1, 8, 9, and 10, shall be disposed of under and pursuant to the provisions of said act of March 16, 1912, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to proceed at once to carry out the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was rejected.

RITTENHOUSE MOORE.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2359) for the relief of Rittenhouse Moore.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will inquire what is the nature of the bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is a little claims bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I inquire if morning business has closed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask the Senator if he thinks the bill will occasion any debate?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to the Senator that I do not think it will.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it seems to me we might spend an hour or two, profitably, on this delightful morning in disposing of bills on the calendar. I will not object to the Senator's request, if the bill is important.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think it will occasion any debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Rittenhouse Moore $3,650.05, in full settlement for the amount stated and claimed by him as set forth in House Document No. 100, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, for dredging in the Potomac River below Washington, D. C., and recommended by the Secretary of War, as therein shown.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN CADDO COUNTY, OKLA.

Mr. OWEN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9829) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain unused remnant lands to the board of county commissioners of Caddo County, Okla., for fairground and park purposes. This is a purely local bill, providing for a county fair to secure part of a quarter section of land.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, we have not, as I understand, finished morning business. There is a resolution coming over from a previous day that I am anxious to have disposed of, and I must object to any further request for unanimous consent to consider bills until we have disposed of morning business.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that this bill was reported on May 1, and has been on the calendar since that time, and unless it is acted upon the county fair association can not use the land this season.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to the bill, but I desire that the regular order shall be proceeded with until we dispose of morning business.

Mr. GALLINGER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. OWEN subsequently said: Mr. President, I renew my request for the present consideration of the bill referred to by me a moment ago. If there is any objection to the bill I shall not urge its consideration. It simply provides that this county board may acquire 110 acres of ground for county fair purposes. It is a short bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the calendar number of the bill?

Mr. OWEN. Four hundred and seven.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I have no objection to the bill, but if we are going to consider bills this morning I think we ought to take up the calendar in regular order. We have been for the last month or so trying to get consideration of the calendar, and we have been unable to do so up to this time. I do not believe it is right to have bills picked out from the calendar and considered, and allow other bills that have been here for months and months to go without consideration.

Mr. OWEN. This bill has been on the calendar since the 1st of May. The next county fair will be held in September, and unless the bill passes very shortly the county authorities will be unable to use the land for the purpose this season.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the calendar number of the bill?

Mr. OWEN. Four hundred and seven.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I demand the regular order.

otherwise authorizing standing or select committees to sit during the sessions of the Senate are hereby rescinded, except in the case of the Committee on Naval Affairs, now considering S. Res. 291.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE RODDENBERY.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it had been the purpose this morning of the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] to ask that the House resolutions upon the death of late Representative RODDENBERY, of Georgia, be laid before the Senate. He has, however, been called away necessarily to the White House, and I ask unanimous consent that, even though the business of the morning hour be finished, the Senator from Georgia may be allowed this morning to call up the resolutions to which I refer.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not hear distinctly the statement of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have suggested that the junior Senator from Georgia desires to call up this morning the House resolutions on the death of late Representative RODDENBERY, of Georgia, and to ask action thereon, but he has been called out of the Senate on business and was compelled to respond. I ask unanimous consent that upon his return during the day he may be allowed to call up these resolutions, even though it be after the morning hour.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is, to call up resolutions during the consideration of the Federal trade commission bill? If we have a morning hour to-morrow, the Senator from Georgia, of course, could then call up the resolutions.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think we will have a morning hour to-morrow. That is the reason why I am so anxious to get the resolutions disposed of to-day.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is not the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia one of the reasons why we should have a morning hour?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but there are other reasons why we should not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Which are the stronger reasons?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think those that we should not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well, then, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions of the House of Representatives which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 8, 1914.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. SEABORN ANDERSON RODDENBERY, late a Member of this House from the State of Georgia.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House at the conclusion of these exercises shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I regret the absence of the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] who is at the White House. He had intended at this time to present the following resolutions, which I present for him, and which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 432), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret the announcement of the death of Hon. SEABORN ANDERSON RODDENBERY, late a Representative from the State of Georgia, which occurred September 26, 1913.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative the business of the Senate be now suspended in order to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and to the family of the deceased.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, SEABORN ANDERSON RODDENBERY, one of the best men who ever came from Georgia to the House of Representatives, died in the very prime of manhood. Young though he was, he had accomplished much. From his earliest youth he was a worker. His activities were divided between the farm and the study. Sturdily he labored tilling the soil, yet never failed to avail himself of every means to gratify his thirst for knowledge. No man ever entered legislative halls better equipped than he.

Born on a farm in 1870, he was educated in the common schools of his county and at Mercer University. After leaving the university he taught school and studied law. When less than 20 years of age he was professor of languages and mathematics at the South Georgia College. When little more than 21 he was sent to the legislature by the people of Thomas County, and there served his State for two years. In rapid succession he was mayor of Thomasville, president of the board of education of Thomas County, judge of the county court for four years, and finally a Representative in Congress.

Judge RODDENBERY was essentially a man of the people. His sympathies were with them, and they knew it. None so poor, none so humble, but felt free to go to him at any time for counsel or assistance. Always that counsel was given without ostentation; always that aid was rendered with painstaking care. Like all strong men, he was gentle in his bearing, patient, tolerant in his attitude toward the opinions of others, while holding firmly to his own carefully formed convictions.

Judge RODDENBERY's life made for the uplift of the race. His thoughts and acts ennoble life. He left the world better for having lived and labored in it. He was a man in whose association and friendship there was genuine inspiration. It will always be a source of pleasure to me to have known him and to have been able to count him a true friend.

It can be said of him with absolute truth that selfishness was not in him. As in private life so in his public career, the noblest altruism governed his every act. His protestations of solicitude for his people were not mere lip service; they came from the heart. Every one of his constituents had an ever-present claim upon his services. This service was rendered freely, ungrudgingly; not from any sense of obligation, personal or political, but because he loved to help and do kind deeds. "I serve" was the motto which ruled every moment of his life.

As a Member of the House of Representatives he bore himself modestly but with firm adherence to principles he had established and convictions he had formed. His voice and his vote were untrammeled. Flattery and applause he heeded little, and censure did not move him.

This phase of his character is strikingly illustrated in his record on pension legislation. He had made a study of the process of lawmaking whereby the pension payments of the Government have been brought to their present inexcusable proportions, notwithstanding the fact that the Union survivors of the War between the States are dying by the thousands every year. Judge RODDENBERY, while entertaining the kindest feelings for the invalid veterans, utterly repudiated the theory of increasingly liberal bounty to persons who had not borne the brunt of the strife. He reached the conclusion that much of this latter-day pension legislation was pure graft, and with this conviction firmly fixed in his mind he combated every proposition which in his opinion went beyond the bounds of justice and the moral obligations of the Government.

Bill after bill was met by his opposition. His arguments—persistently, consistently, and insistently, inveighing against surrendering the hard-earned money of the working people to what he looked upon as the loot of the Treasury—were cutting as the Damascene blade. He did not deal in rounded phrases of flowery rhetoric, but struck with all the force that outraged conviction and intensest indignation could lend to his words.

It was a fight foreordained to defeat. He must have felt that he was leading a forlorn hope against every one of the acts he antagonized. Only a mere handful of men came to his aid, and with him were overwhelmed in the onslaught. Undaunted he returned to the fray. Defeat could not conquer his purpose. He fought for the right as he saw the right. From the path he had marked out for himself neither the pleadings of friends nor the taunt of adversaries could swerve him.

Perhaps I am dwelling too long upon this incident of Judge RODDENBERY's work as a Member of the House of Representatives, but I do so because it illumines more clearly than any other the pervading trait of his character—adherence to righteous purpose. Among the last words he uttered before his spirit fled from this mortal tenement were these: "I have lived my convictions." His convictions—they were the guiding star in every act of his life. How few and far between are the men who at the close of their lives can lay that comfort to their souls.

Judge RODDENBERY was a tireless student. His reading was broad. It embraced every field of thought. Classic lore was to him familiar ground. From the history of nations he never failed to find useful lessons. In philosophical literature he took especial delight. His chosen profession—the law—had in him a most conscientious, untiring member. His keen, analytical habit of thought made him strong before the bench. Before juries he was almost irresistible.

He was devoted to agriculture. With him the cultivation of the soil was not a mere breadwinning occupation. He felt that agriculture is the mainstay of the State and the farmer the most important factor in the economic life of the Nation. While he delighted in sowing the seed, watching the growth of the crops, and rejoiced in the harvest, it was his pleasure to trace the history of agriculture even to the farthest antiquity.

Nor was he content simply to absorb stores of knowledge. He delighted in giving it currency among his friends and neighbors. He was always ready to respond to a summons to address meetings of farmers and give them the benefit of his studious research. Of all the membership of the Congress none surpassed him in the scrutiny of the publications emanating from the Department of Agriculture. Nothing pleased him more than to be able to point out to his people some new way of enriching the soil and how to make two blades of grass grow where before there grew but one. It has been said, "He is indeed the wisest and the happiest man who, by constant attention of thought, discovers the greatest opportunity of doing good, and with ardent and animated resolution breaks through every opposition that he may improve these opportunities." To no man that I have every known do these words apply with more striking force than to ANDERSON RODDENBERY.

Mr. President, in contemplating the career of a public man and seeking to pronounce deserved eulogium upon him, we sometimes lose sight of his private life; and yet some of the most beautiful lessons may be drawn from the life in the home.

> The sphere of harmony and peace,
> The spot where angels find a resting place
> When, bearing blessings, they descend to earth.

Rare Ben Jonson said that—

> To be happy at home is the ultimate result of all ambition; the end to which every enterprise and labor tend, and of which every desire prompts the prosecution.

Such happiness my friend enjoyed. His home was the mainspring that set in motion all his energies. In his home centered his dearest affections, his aspirations, his ambitions. To bring happiness to that home and to the loved ones who dwelt therein was the highest aim of his rarely beautiful life. There the gentlest side of his nature unfolded itself like a beautiful flower. There his affections had their fullest play. There he loved and was beloved by wife and children. In his home the strife of the world was stilled; it was, indeed, to him a sacred refuge.

So, also, was Judge RODDENBERY blessed in his friendships. In him the elements of strength and gentleness were so blended that he attracted men as naturally as the magnet draws the iron. They felt that they could place reliance upon his every word. They knew that he would not fail them in any strait. No wonder, then, that when his remains were borne to their last resting place among his people there was mourning in all the counties of his district. It was as if every family had lost one of its household. He has written his epitaph in the hearts of all of them, and we may regard it inscribed there as it was expressed in a letter from the aged pastor who received him into the church, and who pronounced the last benediction at the grave. That venerable man wrote:

> He was the friend and adviser of the poor. For the struggling boy or girl who desired an education his means were largely employed. He was the friend that you could count on at all times and under all circumstances. He was bold and aggressive in his advocacy of what he conceived to be right; true and loyal to his friends and to the cause he espoused.

Mankind, Mr. President, is under obligations to a man for great thoughts, or great deeds, or great devotion to principle; for clean living, and for the good example it sets. Measured by that standard, we owe a great debt to the memory of our departed friend, which best we may discharge by trying to live as he lived; to be moved by the loftiest dictates of patriotism; to crush selfishness; to strive, as he strove, to obey the injunction of the Master, to do unto others even as we would that others do unto us.

It is not given to frail human nature to attain perfection, but each and every one of us may well be satisfied if when the final summons comes he can say to himself, as did ANDERSON RODDENBERY: "I have lived my convictions."

I move the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia Mr. President, the House has passed a bill authorizing the ground around the Government building at Thomasville, where Mr. RODDENBERY lived, to be known as Roddenbery Park, and authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to accept from the city several other blocks that the city intends to give to the Government around the Government building, the entire ground to be called Roddenbery Park. The House bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to make rules and regulations by which the city of Thomasville is to maintain Roddenbery Park.

For the Senator from Virginia (Mr. SWANSON) I report back favorably from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds the bill H. R. 15110 and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration and, as a compliment to Mr. RODDENBERY's memory, to have it passed unanimously by the Senate, as it was passed unanimously by the House. I ask that the bill be considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill be read.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not understand that this is to be considered as a precedent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think it will be a precedent.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

> A bill (H. R. 15110) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to accept conveyance of title to certain land between the post-office site and Madison Street in the city of Thomasville, Ga.
> Be it enacted, etc., That the post-office site, except where buildings, further addition, and approaches are now or may hereafter be located, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, be used as a public park, to be known as Roddenbery Park, to be maintained by the city of Thomasville, under regulations prescribed from time to time by the Secretary of the Treasury.

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to accept conveyance of title to the land between the post-office site and Madison Street, in the city of Thomasville, Ga., and the said land so acquired shall thereupon become part of said post-office site: Provided, That the said enlarged post-office site, except where buildings, further additions, and approaches are now or may hereafter be located, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, be used as a public park, to be known as Roddenbery Park, to be maintained by the city of Thomasville, under regulations to be prescribed from time to time by the Secretary of the Treasury.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAILY SESSIONS.

Mr. KERN. I ask for the adoption of the following order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That until otherwise ordered, the sessions of the Senate shall be from 11 o'clock a. m. until 6 o'clock p. m., at which last hour a recess shall be taken.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not any objection at all to holding daily sessions from 11 to 6 o'clock, but does not the Senator think that the adoption of this order may cause the Senate considerable trouble at times by providing that we shall take a recess at 6 o'clock?

Mr. KERN. I do not think it would.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator to make it read "not later than 6."

Mr. SMOOT. "Not later than 6 o'clock."

Mr. GALLINGER. It might be convenient to take a recess 5 or 10 minutes earlier than 6, or something like that.

Mr. KERN. I will state to the Senator that I had it in mind that in such a case it could be arranged by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. Not as against a standing order, I should think. I should think it would be very much better to put in the words "not later than 6 o'clock," and then if we should want to take a recess a few minutes before 6 it would not make any difference.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask that the proposed order may be restated by the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order will be again read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That until otherwise ordered, the sessions of the Senate shall be from 11 o'clock a. m. until 6 o'clock p. m., at which last hour a recess shall be taken.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will make it read "not later than 6 o'clock," I think everything will be gained that he desires by the order as it stands.

Mr. KERN. That can be remedied at any time by unanimous consent. I am certain that there will be no difficulty about it.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the adoption of the order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the order.

The order was agreed to.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that the unfinished business, House bill 15613, the trade commission bill, be now taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 15613, to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I call for the yeas and nays.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] to section 5.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What is the proposed amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is that of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] to add at the end of section 5 the following proviso:

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I should like to ask the author of the amendment whether, in a case regularly prosecuted in the court, in which final judgment was rendered by the court in favor of the defendant, his proposed amendment would preclude the pleading and use of that judgment in evidence as an estoppel in a subsequent case brought upon the same facts?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The amendment, as I understand it, simply declares that in any proceeding under the antitrust act no order or finding made either by the commission or the court under section 5 shall be admissible in evidence. I will state that this amendment was, as I said the other day, drawn by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and it is segregated into two parts. I would be very glad if the Senator from Iowa would give his views regarding it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to have the view of the Senator from Nevada, who proposes the amendment and is the proponent of the bill, as to what the effect of the language would be?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have given my individual views again and again. So far as I am concerned individually I would trust to the commission the entire administration and enforcement of the antitrust law. But my individual views on that subject are not likely to prevail. There is a disposition to prevent the commission from taking the place of the Attorney General's office in the enforcement of the law, and to that I yielded. The Senator from Iowa introduced an amendment providing that no order or finding under section 5 should be admitted in evidence in any antitrust proceeding. That amendment I have accepted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The answer of the Senator from Nevada can hardly be described as a categorical answer to the question which I put. The language of this amendment is—

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

If exactly the same question should be presented—I am not saying that it would be, but if exactly the same question that was presented in the first proceeding before the court should be presented in the subsequent suit—does the Senator understand that this amendment would preclude the use by the defendant of the finding or judgment of the court in the first suit as an estoppel to the proceeding in the second suit, covering identically the same question? Does the Senator from Nevada think that would follow?

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Utah permit me to answer the question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. My first observation is that it is impossible that the case suggested by the Senator from Utah should arise. A prosecution under the antitrust law charges either a restraint of trade, a monopoly, or an attempt to monopolize. The prosecution must involve one or the other of those charges; and the issue presented to the court is, Is the defendant guilty of a restraint of trade, guilty of an attempt to monopolize, or guilty of maintaining a monoply? A suit under section 5 must necessarily charge unfair competition, and the action of the commission and the action of the court would be no more than to find either that the defendant had been guilty of unfair competition or had not been guilty of unfair competition.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator would it be sufficient in any proceeding finally brought into court to simply charge unfair competition? Would it not be necessary to set forth the acts which constituted the unfair competition?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Unfair competition is a mere conclusion of law.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was about to proceed to that part of the inquiry.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The copy which I have of the amendment uses the words "this section," but does not name the section.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is a proposed amendment to section 5, so that it is identified in that way. In charging restraint of trade or monopoly it is, of course, necessary that the pleader shall state the facts which in his opinion constitute the restraint of trade or the monopoly or the attempt to monopolize, and in a suit under section 5 it would be necessary for the pleader to state the facts which in his opinion constituted unfair competition. But the order of the court or the commission in the latter case would be simply that the defendant had been guilty of unfair competition. The order of the court in the former case would be simply that the defendant had restrained trade or monopolized. It is the purpose of this amendment to prevent the judgment in one case becoming res adjudicata in the other case.

I do not believe the existence of any particular fact could be so segregated from the judgment or the finding of the court in either case as to make it wise that there should be an adjudication upon that one fact. Suppose, for instance, that in the allegation of unfair competition it were charged that the defendant had for a long series of months sold the product in which he dealt so far below actual cost as to indicate a purpose not to continue to trade legitimately but to injure and destroy a particular competitor; that one fact might be material in prosecutions under the antitrust law, and also in prosecutions for unfair competition; but I do not believe that the judgment of the court or the order of the commission under this section, even though it involved, or might involve, the existence of that fact, should be pleaded as an adjudication of that particular fact in a suit under the antitrust law.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just one moment. The reason for my conclusion, I think, is obvious. It is, of course, within the discretion of the prosecuting officer or the prosecuting attorney under either the antitrust law or under section 5 of this bill, as it is within the discretion of the defendant in either case, to bring forward such testimony as he thinks ought to be brought forward with reference to the broad issue in the one case of restraint of trade, and in the other case of unfair competition.

It would not be fair either to the Government or to the defendant to say that a fact which might have varying degrees of materiality and of persuasiveness should be taken as established under the antitrust law because of the testimony that was offered with regard to it in a prosecution under this section. Therefore, the attempt is to keep the prosecution in the two cases entirely separate and distinct. Now I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Might this not be material testimony and entitled to some weight as testimony of value, and at the same time not have the potency of reaching to a res adjudicata or being accepted as conclusive in an action brought under the antitrust act and yet be valuable as proving a fact which with a chain of other facts might constitute an offense under this statute, and as such be competent testimony?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not so understand. I may be wrong with regard to the opinion I am about to announce, but my view of the law is that when a judgment of a court rendered between the parties is admissible at all in any other judicial proceeding it is final and conclusive, because it is an adjudication of a competent tribunal of that fact between those parties.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is evidence, however, even if it be conclusive evidence.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is precisely what I say—it is conclusive evidence; and I think it would be unwise to impose upon either the plaintiff or the defendant the burden of conclusive evidence when that evidence may be thought not material, or, if material, may be of slight value, and therefore not very much considered, when one issue is being tried and very important or vital when another issue is being tried.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This amendment provides:

That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

Is that intended to exclude the finding of the commission as even prima facie evidence where application is made to enforce the order of the commission in a particular case?

Mr. CUMMINS. No. The Senator from Georgia has not observed that this inhibition is against the admissibility of the order of the court or of the commission in a suit brought to enforce the provisions of the antitrust laws.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, its provisions make the very bill we have before us one of the antitrust laws.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President; I think the Senator from Georgia is in error about that. The antitrust laws referred to in this bill are, first, the act of 1890, known as the Sherman antitrust law; secondly, the two acts which are found in the tariff laws relating to trusts and monopolies. This reference does not include the proposed statute we are now discussing.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee will undoubtedly be added to what are called antitrust laws, and that bill contemplates making the finding of the commission prima facie evidence in the courts in actions to enforce its provisions.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Georgia is right about that being the phraseology of the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee. That bill when enacted will be a part of the antitrust laws and will be included within the definition of the first section, but that is not true of this proposed act.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will not this provision declaring "unfair competition" to be unlawful become one of the antitrust laws?

Mr. CUMMINS. The antitrust laws which are enumerated in this act are found on page 13 of the bill. I will read that reference so that there can be no future doubt about it. It is as follows:

"Antitrust acts" means the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890; also sections 73 to 77, inclusive, of an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved August 27, 1894; and also the act entitled "An act to amend sections 73 and 76 of the act of August 27, 1894, entitled 'An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,'" approved February 12, 1913.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then it is not the purpose of this amendment to prevent the findings of the commission from being used at least as prima facie evidence in a legal proceeding to enforce the finding of the commission?

Mr. CUMMINS. If I may be permitted a reply, what is intended is this: We have in mind, of course, mainly the antitrust act of 1890; the others may be dismissed for the present, because they are not material in this discussion.

One of the sections—I think section 4 of that act—provides that the Government can bring a suit to enjoin any person or corporation from restraining trade or monopolizing or attempting to monopolize it; but those suits have been so frequently brought, and they have been so prominent in the discussion of this subject, that they are prefectly well known and their character, of course, thoroughly understood.

The purpose of this amendment is to prevent any order of either commission or court in a proceeding respecting unfair competition, under section 5, from becoming admissible in evidence in a suit brought by the United States under the antitrust act of 1890 where the issue is not unfair competition, but restraint of trade or monopoly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then would it not be well to say "the antitrust act of 1890," instead of "the antitrust acts"? We expect to call the Clayton bill, when it is passed, one of the antitrust acts, and will we not get into a conflict?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think this reference is just as necessary, so far as the Clayton bill is concerned, as it is with reference to the antitrust act of 1890. The purpose is to keep these things apart, so that when different offenses are charged the testimony and the findings of the court in one case shall not be controlling in another.

As I said the other day, from a strictly legal point of view I do not regard the amendment as necessary; I do not believe these orders and findings would be admissible under the well-established principles of the law; but I want, if I can—and that was the purpose of my amendment—to make it impossible for anybody to assert that we were in this bill endeavoring to emasculate or to destroy the efficiency of the antitrust act of 1890.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the able Senator from Iowa whether a given premises which I shall now prescribe is not likely to arise to the disadvantage of a defendant. I illustrate: The amendment tendered by the Senator and proposed by the chairman provides—

That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

I observe that the expression "admissible in evidence" is used. I want to impose upon my learned friend this thought: In an ordinary criminal case a defendant would have a right to introduce before the court that he had been advised by his counsel to pursue a certain course, and, though the advice may have been wrong and he may really have violated the law, the court will take the suggestion, looking to the question of the defendant's intent, into consideration in inflicting penalty.

Now, I ask the learned Senator, under the provision that the order or finding of the court or commission should not be admissible in evidence, would not the defendant be greatly embarrassed in the following circumstances: Suppose there should be a proceeding before the commission and it should be held as a result of that proceeding that the man was not guilty of unfair competition, and yet a criminal proceeding should subsequently be had under which he should be found guilty of a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. Ought not that man to have the right to have introduced in that case in some form that finding of the commission in order that the judge might consider that finding in inflicting penalty looking to the man's intent? I fear under this section that, even though the commission had found there was no unfair competition, the defendant, when the judge came to inflict a penalty, would have no right to have the order introduced and thus have his offense mitigated in proportion because of the previous order that exculpated him, though it was not a defense as to the charge of violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. Would the Senator consent to have the amendment amended so as to read, after the words "antitrust acts," "but may be considered by any judge or court in inflicting or prescribing punishment for any violation of the antitrust laws"?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I would be reluctant to see the words which the Senator from Illinois has just proposed attached to the amendment for this reason: If a defendant is convicted of a crime under the antitrust act and his counsel is addressing the court with a view to mitigating or reducing the penalty or punishment, the considerations which he offers the court upon such an occasion are not evidence in the case. The evidence must be introduced before the case is submitted to the jury, and the jury must have an opportunity to consider and weigh all the evidence in the case.

I can well understand that after a conviction the intent or general conduct or the general standing of the defendant may be taken into consideration by the court in determining the extent of the penalty which shall be imposed, whether it be fine or imprisonment; but all those things can be done without any authority in the statute. Such action can be taken simply because that is a part of the established procedure of all courts; and I hope that the amendment will not be so changed as that the prior order of a court under section 5 could be offered in evidence. I think the Senator from Illinois will distinguish the difference between evidence offered in the case and considerations that are proposed to the court in determining what penalty shall be imposed.

Mr. LEWIS. Then the Senator from Iowa, as I understand him, does not fear that this expression would be an indication to the court that an order or finding of the commission is not to be received into the cause for any purpose whatever?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not prepared to say whether it would be or could be received for any purpose; but I am very sure that the words which I now propose as an amendment would not preclude making the suggestion to the court after the verdict.

Mr. LEWIS. Now, may I ask the able Senator in what way would you get before the court the fact that there had been an order made by the commission that on its face indicated that the people against whom the proceeding was being had were not guilty of unfair competition, therefore indicating a lack of criminal intent, to be considered in mitigation of their offense, if it has been prescribed that such order shall not be introduced in the case?

Mr. CUMMINS. If it is proper to be brought to the attention of the court at all, it would be brought in any way that counsel might desire, just as a long life of probity, established by the word of neighbors——

Mr. LEWIS. May I say to the Senator that that would have to be introduced in evidence under general character and good behavior?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; all these things can be used, as I have seen them used, and I am sure the Senator has seen them used, when the counsel are urging a light penalty or light imprisonment.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. WHITE. Does not the situation hypothesized by the Senator from Illinois occur after the suit has ended, and is there any suit pending at that time; and does not this amendment contemplate that the evidence shall be evidence offered during the pendency of the suit? In other words, would there be any suit pending under the situation hypothesized by the Senator from Illinois that would exclude the consideration of anything that might be considered by the court in mitigation of punishment?

As a matter of fact, as I understand, the suit has then ended, and matters of any character are brought to the consideration of the court. Facts might be introduced showing the situation of the defendant, the character and number of his family, or, as the Senator from Iowa has suggested, a long life of good behavior, and the fact that it is the first offense. Therefore it is not technically evidence offered in the case, while this amendment contemplates evidence offered during the pendency of the proceeding.

Mr. LEWIS. Permit me to say to the able Senator, if I may, Mr. President, that I can not accept the idea advanced by the able Senator from Alabama. I can not accept the idea that a suit no longer pends merely because the evidence has been closed and judgment has not been pronounced. My judgment is that the suit is still pending until a final appeal and affirmance or reversal.

I again state my position, and if the able Senators think my fear is unfounded I prefer to yield to their excellent judgment. I express the feeling that they are with me on the justice of my position; and if it is not debarred by the expressions in the amendment, then I have no desire to embarrass the amendment by the addition of words.

This is my fear: If there were nothing whatever said, if there had been no such amendment as proposed by the Senator from Iowa, I contend that the position of the Senator from Alabama would be absolutely correct; that you could introduce before the court all of the matters which ordinarily would be presented to a court under similar conditions; but that after we have put in an amendment which states that no order of finding shall be admissible as evidence in any suit the court might construe that our object was not to have that order considered for any purpose whatever in that other proceeding.

Now, unless it serves as a barrier in that respect my position is wrong. If it does serve as a barrier, I should like to have it so amended that the man would get the benefit of this honest mistake, if he has made one.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I am not aware of any procedure by which testimony is taken in a formal way by the court upon the question as to the degree of sentence that is to be pronounced on a defendant. Whatever transpires comes in response to that inquiry under the common law; and that is, when the defendant is called up for sentence he is asked by the court what he has to say why sentence should not be pronounced upon him under the law. In response to that inquiry he himself, or through his attorney, can state any facts that he regards as material to reduce the sentence or to invoke the clemency of the court.

There is nothing in this amendment which would debar the defendant's attorney, or the defendant himself, from calling attention to that fact, like any other fact; but those facts are brought before the court in that informal manner, and not as a matter of testimony in the case.

Mr. LEWIS. I recognize that distinction, which is urged, and urged with clearness, by both Senators. I again express my fear, however, that having specifically legislated that the order shall not be received in the case, a court might conclude that the policy of our legislation was that it was not to be considered for any purpose in the case. Now, if I am wrong in that my amendment is unnecessary. If I am right in that, something ought to be done in order to give the man a chance to plead that order in mitigation of the penalty, should he be convicted of a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act after there was an order that acquitted him of unfair competition.

Mr. CUMMINS. I feel sure the fears of the Senator from Illinois are unfounded. This prohibition is against the admissibility of these orders or findings in evidence. They are not to be admissible as evidence. I think the showing which the Senator from Minnesota has described so well and so completely, which is made in order to induce the favor of the court in imposing sentence, has never in the history of judicial procedure been termed evidence.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. As I understand the position of the Senator from Iowa, it is that inasmuch as the pending bill is designed to provide against unfair methods of competition it is distinct and different from the measures which we call the antitrust measures, and as a consequence the proviso is not only desirable, but expedient, since otherwise the proceedings under this act might prevent the enforcement of the provisions of the other act or acts, or at least modify or influence their attempted enforcement and application. I would suggest, if that is so, that it ought to be accompanied by a corresponding inhibition as to proceedings under those laws with reference to proceedings under this one, so that the amendment would read:

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts; nor shall any order or finding of the courts in the enforcement of the antitrust acts be admissible as evidence in any proceeding or in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the provisions hereof.

In other words, if we are going to introduce this proviso, should it not be made mutual, so that no proceedings under the other acts can be introduced as evidence or permitted to influence proceedings here, while on the other hand none of these proceedings shall be permitted to influence or be introduced in evidence either for or against the parties in proceedings under the antitrust acts?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the observation of the Senator from Colorado is sound. It had not occurred to me before, but it is perfectly obvious that the prohibition ought to be mutual. If the Senator will prepare such an addition, I for one shall be glad to see it added to the section. I only suggest, however, that the language should not imply that there was any criminal prosecution to be brought under section 5, inasmuch as the enforcement of that section is through civil process alone.

Mr. THOMAS. My judgment does not approve of the proposed amendment; but it seems to me that if its office is as stated by the Senator from Iowa—and I have no doubt it is—then there should be some such addition to it as would make it mutual. Personally I very much doubt the wisdom of adopting the amendment. I shall have something to say upon that subject later.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not doubt that this proviso, if adopted, would not prevent the consideration by the Judge, when he came to pronounce sentence, of any proceedings under section 5 of the socalled "trade-commission bill." I do not think a provision that such finding or order should not be admissible in evidence would prevent the judge, when it came to sentence, from considering it. He may consider anything he pleases in mitigation of punishment, and he may consider matters that are not admissible in evidence at all; anything that appeals to his discretion upon the matter of punishment.

The objection that occurs to me, however, is a deeper one than that. I assume that the same acts may conceivably be a violation of the unfair-competition statute and also a violation of the antitrust act. If so, upon what theory of justice should a defendant who has been acquitted of a series of acts charged as unfair competition be denied the right to set up that judgment of a court in another proceeding involving the same acts, though called by a different name?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me there?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What would the Senator say if the order made by the commission were adverse to the defendant? For instance, suppose the commission had investigated half a dozen different charges against the defendant under this statute, and had found that the competition was unfair competition, or the methods of competition were unfair, and then afterwards another action was commenced against the same defendant for violating the antitrust act, for being guilty of restraint of trade. Would the Senator say that in the absence of this amendment these successive orders and findings of the court showing that the same defendant had been guilty of these different unfair methods of competition as sequences included in the general complaint of restraint of trade might not be competent testimony, not for the purpose of proving res adjudicata, but for the purpose of being considered as evidential matters establishing the general charge of pursuing a business in restraint of trade?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. So far as the findings of the commission are concerned, I think they ought not to be considered as evidence.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I refer more particularly to the findings of the court.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am taking up the propositions of the Senator seriatim. I am first dealing with the question of the commission. So far as the findings of the commission are concerned, I do not think they ought to be evidence anywhere.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not, either.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I doubt very much whether we could make them evidence. I hope to discuss that question in another connection, later along, before we get through with this bill. So far as the decision of the court is concerned, however, I see no reason in the world why that decision should not be admissible as an estoppel in another proceeding involving the same facts, though called by a different name.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will pardon me a moment while I follow out the thought which I have in mind—it is the general policy of our law, of the common law, that there shall be an end of litigation; that parties shall not be compelled to respond to the same charges in court more than once. In civil cases that finds its expression in the maxim—I am not attempting to quote it literally—that no person shall be twice vexed with the same litigation. It finds its expression in the criminal law in the rule that no person shall be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb for the same offense.

The question to which the law addresses itself when that matter arises is whether, in substance, the person is being twice vexed with the same case, or, in substance, whether the defendant has been twice put in jeopardy of life or limb. The form of the action is immaterial. The same set of facts may constitute a violation of more than one penal statute. It may be in one aspect that the same facts may constitute one offense and in another aspect a different offense, but if the defendant be prosecuted for either one of those offenses and be acquitted he can not afterwards be prosecuted for the other offense, although you may call it by a different name if it involves exactly the same facts.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the able Senator from Utah does not mean different jurisdictions?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, no; I am not speaking of different jurisdictions. This is the same jurisdiction. Of course a series of acts may constitute an offense against the Federal Government and against the State government, and both may prosecute.

Mr. LEWIS. That interests me. That is the thing that has been troubling me. May I say to the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Iowa that I have not expressed myself at all satisfactorily this morning, as I do not think I have at all expressed with clearness the fear that I had in my mind? When it comes to penalty, may I invite the attention of both Senators to an illustration, both having had very extensive practice of the law?

A man is charged with violating the law or municipal ordinance against carrying concealed weapons. My very able friend from Connecticut, having had some experience in municipal legal matters, I am sure will recall the instance to which I shall now invite the Senators' attention. We will say that a defendant is found guilty or not guilty, as the case may be, by the municipal court. He is proceeded against by the State upon an indictment in a different jurisdiction of the same State. In what way can the judgment of the municipality in which the man was acquitted or in which he may have been found guilty and fined be brought to the attention of the State tribunal as a mitigation of the penalty without the judgment being brought to the attention of the court in some form?

The mere statement of counsel, if he is an honorable gentleman, of course, would be accepted; but fancy how many illustrations can arise to our minds where a false statement can be made or where the court will say: "I can not consider that mattter on your statement, however much I trust you, as I have not the exact facts before me in order to see that these exact facts were before the court at that particular time."

That is the thing that is in my mind.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was not particularly concerned in that phase of this discussion. I think, however, that there would be not the slightest difficulty in it. When a defendant has been convicted by a jury and finally called for sentence counsel may stand up and present the record. It is not a formal matter. What the judge does upon an application for a mitigation of punishment is not a judicial proceeding in the sense that nothing can be admitted that the laws of evidence do not recognize as admissible. The judge can consider anything he pleases.

Mr. LEWIS. While the Senator could have considered it under ordinary circumstances, which we all concede, the Senator does not think that the words of the amendment, "shall not be received," and so forth, would be an intimation to the court that it was not to be considered for any purpose whatever?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think not.

Mr. LEWIS. That is the only fear, and I would rather yield to the judgment of the committee than trust my own.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, we come back to the question which I was discussing. It makes no difference what name we give to a series of acts, the question in the one case, in the civil case, is whether the defendant is being twice vexed with prosecution for the same series of acts. The same set of acts may, as I have said, conceivably constitute a violation of the unfair-competition statute, and upon a final hearing in a court of justice the court may find and solemnly adjudge that the defendant has committed that series of acts which will constitute unfair competition. Later along a prosecution is instituted under the antitrust act, based perhaps entirely upon the same acts which were alleged in the prior action as constituting unfair competition. By what rule of law, by what rule of justice, should the defendant be prevented from pleading that in another proceeding, although called by another name, under another statute, the court had held that he was not guilty of committing the acts which are charged in both proceedings? That is the point that I have in mind.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to put to the Senator from Utah this question: Suppose A sues B for trespass upon property. B defaults and there is a judgment in favor of A. Among the allegations of the petition there is, we will assume, a charge that B was present upon the property of A. Thereafter A sues B for damages for an assault committed at the same time. Would the Senator from Utah claim that the judgment in the suit for trespass should be a bar or conclusive in favor of the plaintiff in the suit for assault?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; because the two cases would involve different facts; but if the presence of the defendant at a given time and place was necessary to the maintenance of the act of the trespass, and the court had found that he was not present, I would imagine that judgment might be pleaded upon that precise issue whenever presented in another case. But that is not——

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not disagreeing with the Senator from Utah regarding that; but the verdict must be guilty or not guilty, and suppose the very issue that the Senator from Utah has stated, namely, the presence of the defendant upon the property of the plaintiff, there is no finding except a verdict of not guilty.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator is now supposing two criminal cases.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I am supposing two civil cases. There is no criminal procedure under section 5. I have in mind here particularly a civil procedure under the antitrust act, and my illustration was a civil case for trespass, with a verdict of not guilty, and then a civil case for assault. We will assume, now, that in the former case there was contested the question as to whether the defendant was personally upon the property of the plaintiff. Does the Senator from Utah think that the judgment of not guilty in the former case could be pleaded in estoppel or as a bar to the suit for assault?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think so. I think there would be two entirely different cases depending upon two entirely different sets of facts. One would be a trespass upon property and the other would be a personal assault.

Mr. CUMMINS. While it is quite possible that the same fact will be investigated in both cases, yet it is not the existence of that fact which is the judgment of the court, but it is the effect of that fact in view of all the surrounding circumstances upon the law. Its effect might be very different in inquiring into a restraint of trade and inquiring into unfair competition.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, of course all I want is that the law shall be left as it is. If the second case which is presented, namely, the prosecution under the antitrust act, does not present an appropriate case for pleading the estoppel in a former case, then, of course, it would not be received. If it does, I want the law left as it is; that is all. In other words, if under existing law, in the absence of this proviso, a set of facts arise wherein in the second prosecution under the antitrust act the defendant may plead the action of the court in a prosecution and under the unfair competition statute, I want that left as it is. I do not want to limit the rights of the defendant in that particular, and I think there is danger of doing it by this amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume the Senator from Utah is just as solicitous for the rights of the Government as he is for the defendant.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. He has used several times the word "defendant." I assume we all want to protect the fair, proper rights of both complainant and defendant. If the charge in a suit under this section is conclusive in favor of the defendant, it must also be conclusive in favor of the Government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly; estoppels must be mutual. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. An alleged offender is brought, through the commission, before the court with regard to unfair competition. The consequences may not be very grave, and the person so charged is therefore not very particular with regard to the evidence that he introduces in opposition to the charge. Thereupon an order of the commission is presented that the person or corporation must desist from the unfair practice, and it goes on and on and finally reaches a magnitude or seriousness that constitutes an offense under the antitrust law, and a suit is brought under that law. Does the Senator from Utah think that in such a case the Government ought to be able to bring forward the order of the commission or the order of the court, if one follows, in order to convict that person or corporation under the antitrust law or to prove conclusively that he or it had committed the acts charged and involved in the former procedure? It would seem to me very unfair inasmuch as the issue is different and the consequences are different, and therefore we ought to keep each separate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I think exactly what I have said. The Senator makes rather a long statement, and while, if written out so that I could analyze it, I might be able to answer it categorically, it is sometimes confusing when a question of that kind is put to a Senator on his feet to analyze it and answer it offhand. All I mean to say is that cases may arise where exactly the same facts and the same acts of commission will constitute a violation of the unfair-competition statute, and those same acts, neither more nor less, may conceivably constitute a violation of the antitrust statute. If the court in a prosecution for unfair competition has investigated all the acts and has rendered a judgment specific in terms, saying that the defendant has committed none of those acts, upon what theory should the defendant be prevented from pleading that judgment in another case, called by a different name but based upon precisely the same acts, or, conversely, the Government doing the same thing?

Mr. KENYON and Mr. WHITE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will yield first to the Senator from Iowa and then I will yield to Senator from Alabama.

Mr. KENYON. Would the court under this act be authorized to render any such judgment or order as the Senator has suggested? If there are no acts of unfair competition—I am in the dark about this language and I am asking for information—is it not the provision of this amendment that the finding of the court or commission is the order that is issued in the enforcement of this section? Now, what is that order? The court can issue an injunction to enforce an order of the commission. The only order the commission can issue is one restraining and prohibiting the use of unfair methods of competition.

The only process of the court would be the injunction to enforce that order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think there is great force in what the Senator says, but, in the first place, I can not conceive of an order being issued simply commanding a corporation to desist from unfair methods of competition, saying nothing more. The defendant could not know what he was ordered to desist from. The order, I assume, of necessity must specify the thing which he must desist from.

Mr. KENYON. Suppose the court should find there was no offense, no unfair competition; that is the end of the matter. Then there is no order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the commission simply finds there has been unfair competition and issues a general order saying the defendant shall desist from unfair competition, such an order would obviously be a nullity.

Mr. KENYON. I do not claim to know. I am simply trying to get information. The court would issue the order specifying the acts of unfair competition, if the court found there was unfair competition; but suppose the court finds there is no unfair competition, it makes no order at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I, of course, assume that before we get through with this bill, in view of the amendments which are pending, there will be some provision put in which will give the court power to try the charge of unfair competition; and if the court is given the power to try it and decide it, I can not conceive of its being presented to the court in any other way than by some form of pleading which will state the facts as distinguished from the mere legal conclusion. So in some way or other finally, if this is to be effective, the facts must be stated to the court and the court must be called upon to pass upon the facts.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to suggest to the Senator——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I promised to yield to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE. From illustrations used by the Senator from Utah in discussing this amendment I assume that he is opposing the amendment on the ground that it is not in accord with sound public policy.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. The illustrations cited by the Senator are apt in showing that in criminal cases the pleas of autrefois acquit and autrefois convict and former jeopardy are complete answers on a second trial, when the facts which were admissible on the first trial would be admissible on the second, and that the pleas of res judicata would be a complete answer on a second trial of a civil suit, where the evidence offered in support of the action in the first trial would be admissible to support the action on the second. I quite agree with the Senator that these propositions are in accord with the general principles of the Anglo-Saxon law, but they are not universal.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It has been the universal policy in criminal cases.

Mr. WHITE. Except in cases where the same act is punishable under different authorities, such as acts punishable both by the State and National Governments.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. There are notable exceptions to the rule, as stated by the Senator, one of them being the action of ejectment at common law. There are other exceptions under modern statutes and practice, namely, in ad quod dammum proceedings, in which commissioners have been appointed to assess the value of the property sought to be condemned, from which an appeal has been taken to a tribunal where the case is to be retried. On this second trial the findings of the commission are not admissible in evidence and can in no way affect the last trial.

There are instances where the findings on the same facts on one trial are not admissible in evidence and are without weight in the second trial, namely, in civil suits to recover damages for assaults and batteries. The findings and judgments in such suits are not admissible in the trials of the parties when being prosecuted criminally for the same act. The same is true under many other similar circumstances. In such cases the findings in one case are not admissible in evidence in the other. A quite sufficient reason why the findings in the first trial above mentioned should not be used as evidence in the second is that the parties to the actions are different, but these cases will illustrate the idea that an offender against the law may be proceeded against twice for the same violation of the law.

One reason why the amendment should be adopted and the findings and orders of the commission or court not be admissible in proceedings instituted under the antitrust laws is that proceedings to be instituted under this act are largely preventive in their purposes and objects. The proceedings under the act as I understand it will be mainly to prevent unfair competition and not punish it after it has been practiced. The adoption of the amendment will have beneficial effect on the proceedings under this act in that it will tend to widen the scope of the investigation, the commission and court understanding at the time that the finding and orders are not to be used to conclude parties to proceedings in any future trials or produce a consequence other than to induce the finding or order to be made when the facts are under consideration.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator from Alabama for his statement of the rules with reference to estoppel and the exceptions, with which in a general way I was already familiar. Of course, there are exceptions to the rule. The exception with reference to actions of ejectment is one well recognized. The other exceptions the Senator calls attention to are well known. They only serve to emphasize the general rule, however, that as a general thing a person ought not to be twice vexed with the same litigation. That is the general rule, and, as in most cases, these occasional exceptions simply serve to emphasize the wisdom and the justice of the general rule.

This does not come within any of those exceptions so far as the findings of the commission are concerned. I have already said I do not think they ought to be considered anywhere as evidence.

Mr. President, I have substantially completed all that I desire to say, but let me give this illustration: Suppose that we were dealing entirely with criminal proceedings. Suppose that this statute with reference to unfair competition should provide that unfair competition is hereby declared to be unlawful, that any person violating the provision shall be subject to fine and imprisonment, and under that an individual were prosecuted charged with unfair competition. An indictment would state the facts. It would be obliged to state the general or ultimate facts. It would not be sufficient to say "unfair competition." Suppose upon that indictment the trial was had and the defendant were acquitted, and subsequently that same defendant should be indicted under the antitrust act for doing precisely the same thing and it is alleged to be not a violation of the unfair competition statute but a violation of the antitrust act. Can there be any doubt in that case the constitutional provision would apply, that the defendant could not be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb for the same offense, and that that could be successfully pleaded? If that could be done in the case I have illustrated, then it seems to me that it is unwise policy to pass a law which will prevent a defendant from doing it in two civil cases, called by different names, between the same parties, the United States as complainant and a corporation as defendant, each case called by different names, but involving precisely the same facts. I think it is unwise policy, to say the least about it. It is unjust, to say the least about it, to prevent the defendant in the second case from pleading that he has been adjudged by the court in the first case not to have committed the acts which are charged in the second case.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, this commission is not a court, as I understand it. While the Senator from Utah and I agree that section 5 is probably utterly void, because it is an ineffectual attempt to confer judicial power upon an administrative commission, still the order that the commission may make is not a judgment of a court. Still the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] argued that the commission would have a right to find that the person who was charged with an unfair method of competition was not guilty of an unfair method of competition, even if it be but the opinion which Congress itself has said should be rendered by this Government commission for the guidance of the business man. If that commission, fit to decide the question, can find that the man who was haled before it was not guilty of unfair competition or an unfair method, it seems to me that the innocent party is certainly entitled to have that finding or that opinion operate to his advantage wherever he is charged with anything which savors of the nature of what he was charged with before the commission.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], if I understand him correctly, says that it would manifestly be unfair to have the finding of this commission introduced in evidence in a suit brought by the Department of Justice and in a Federal court under the act of July 2, 1890, the Sherman antitrust law, because the commission is not authorized by section 5 of this bill to determine what is a restraint of trade, which would be the question if the Department of Justice were acting under the Sherman Antitrust Act to dismember a corporation for engaging in a restraint of trade. But the trouble about it is—and this is the answer to the Senator from Iowa—that many things that this commission may find to be unfair methods of competition, if section 5 could stand and be valid in the law, quite likely would also be restraint of trade.

I do not need to enter upon an enumeration of the thousands of different devices and processes in the multitudinous efforts of the great number of competitors for all kinds of business in this country, the thousands of different methods of competition which they use, and I do not need to anticipate, because it would be trying to catch a flea on a sand beach to attempt to anticipate, the number of different methods of competition which the business competitors of this country will be driven to, to take the places of those which this commission may pronounce to be unfair. Mr. President, it will be as protean and as varied as the invention of the burglar to beat the safe. There is no limit to the devices which the ingenuity of competitors will resort to as they are forbidden to indulge those which they are practicing. So it is useless to attempt to enumerate the different things which some people think or would judge to be unfair methods in competition. They are as varied as the ethical conceptions of the consciences of men.

Everybody who is a lawyer knows he never had a client who would admit, when he was contesting most vigorously with the client of another lawyer, that he wanted anything except what was just and reasonable and fair, and yet they were at swords' points, and would spend their entire fortunes to maintain their position and their opinion about what was just and reasonable and fair.

This commission, not yet chosen, are to decide, if such a proposition can be upheld under American law, whether a given practice presented to them is fair or unfair. Suppose the method of competition which is in question before the commission is selling in one part of the country at a price less than is charged in another, or is any other of the specific acts which have been mentioned by the courts in the decision of cases brought to them under the Sherman antitrust law, which if pursued far enough and as applied to a particular case might amount to a restraint of trade under the Sherman antitrust law. If that is the unfair method of competition complained of before this commission, and the commission, if it has authority to do so under this act—that authority is not specially conferred, but the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] thinks it is inherent in any tribunal which has authority to decide anything—decides that, in its opinion, the method complained of is not unfair; and supposing the next week the Attorney General brings a proceeding in the Federal court alleging that the very method of competition which the commission has just decided to be perfectly fair is in restraint of trade and commerce among the States—if this amendment should be adopted, in my opinion, the defendant could not introduce as evidence either as a defense or in mitigation or for any other purpose the opinion of the very tribunal that we are now proposing to set up to determine what is an unfair method of competition.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. WEST. Does the Senator from Connecticut mean to say that under this bill the opinion of the trade commission could not even be used in mitigation of the offense?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think that is true. What the amendment provides is this:

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

What can be the object sought in preventing an innocent man from having the benefit of the opinion of this commission, if it may render one. I do not see; neither, if the judgment of this commission or its opinion is worth anything, do I see, if suit is brought by the Attorney General under the Sherman antitrust law charging as a violation of that law the same act that was before the commission charged with being an unfair method of competition, why the Government should not be allowed to introduce the order of the commission directing the man to stop the practice or the injunction of the court at the request of the commission, as provided in section 5. There may be some reason for it that I do not apprehend. I regard it as unwise and uncalled for, and I think that it would be a great and unfair burden to be placed upon the business men who have to be summoned before this commission in addition to other burdens proposed by this bill to be placed upon them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Sterling
Bankhead	Hollis	Overman	Stone
Borah	Hughes	Page	Sutherland
Brandegee	Kenyon	Perkins	Swanson
Bryan	Kern	Reed	Thomas
Camden	Lane	Saulsbury	Thornton
Catron	Lea, Tenn.	Shafroth	Tillman
Chamberlain	Lee, Md.	Sheppard	Vardaman
Chilton	Lewis	Shields	Walsh
Clapp	Martin, Va.	Simmons	West
Clarke, Ark.	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.	White
Crawford	Nelson	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Culberson	Newlands	Smith, Md.
Cummins	Norris	Smoot

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I propose now to read the trade commission bill and the Clayton bill, in order that some opportunity may be given to the country to see what the bills are. Those bills, having been reported to the Senate, Senators offer various amendments to them, the discussion proceeds upon the amendment, and no one has any idea of what the provision is which it is proposed to amend or what the effect of the amendment will be. The pending bill, which is Calendar No. 518, House bill 15613, entitled "An act to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes, reads as follows:

That a commission is hereby created and established, to be known as the Federal trade commission, composed of five members, not more than three of whom shall be members of the same political party, and the said Federal trade commission is referred to hereinafter as "the commission."

The words defined in this section shall have the following meaning when found in this act, to wit——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask for order, so that we may hear the Senator from Connecticut. Some of us are not familiar with the bill and we want to hear what is in it.

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (continuing)—

"Commerce" means such commerce as Congress has the power to regulate under the Constitution.

The term "corporation" or "corporations" shall include joint-stock associations and all other associations having shares of capital or capital stock, organized to carry on business for profit.

"Antitrust acts" means the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890; also sections 73 to 77, inclusive, of an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved August 27, 1894; and also the act entitled "An act to amend sections 73 and 76 of the act of August 27, 1894, entitled 'An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,'" approved February 12, 1913.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will request that I be not interrupted during the reading of the bill, because my object is to inform the public as to what the bill is.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I merely wanted to make a suggestion in regard to the reading.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I resume:

SEC. 2. Upon the organization of the commission the Bureau of Corporations and the offices of Commissioner and Deputy Commissioner of Corporations shall cease to exist, and the employees of said bureau shall become employees of the commission in such capacity as it may designate.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have requested not to be interrupted.

Mr. SWANSON. I hope the Senator will speak louder. It is impossible to hear him over here.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know how anxious the Senator is to learn the terms of the bill which is now being read for the first time, and I will endeavor to speak loud enough so that any Senator who wants to hear me may do so, provided those who are sitting around him will let the Senator who has the floor do the talking. The bill continues:

The commission shall take over all the records, furniture, and equipment of said bureau. All work and proceedings pending before the bureau may be continued by the commission free from the direction or control of the Secretary of Commerce. All appropriations heretofore made for the support and maintenance of the bureau and its work are hereby authorized to be expended by the commission for said purposes.

Any commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. A vacancy in the commission shall not impair the right of the remaining commissioners to exercise all the powers of the commission.

The commissioners shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The terms of office of the commissioners shall be seven years each. The terms of those first appointed by the President shall date from the taking effect of this act, and shall be as follows:

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, we are utterly unable to hear the Senator from Connecticut. I know he is discussing a matter of great importance, and I trust the Senator will raise his voice so that Senators on this side of the Chamber may hear him.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As I have said before, if the Senators who are sitting in the neighborhood of the Senator from New Jersey would allow me to do the talking, I think the Senator would have no trouble in hearing; or, if under those circumstances he can not hear, there are plenty of vacant seats on this side any one of which the Senator could occupy and no doubt hear my remarks:

One shall be appointed for a term of three years, one for a term of four years, one for a term of five years, one for a term of six years, and one for a term of seven years; and after said commissioners shall have been so first appointed all appointments, except to fill vacancies, shall be for terms of seven years each. The commission shall elect one of its members chairman for such period as it may determine.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. O'GORMAN. A parliamentary inquiry: Is the Senate in session?

Mr. BRANDEGEE (continuing):

The commission shall elect a secretary and may elect an assistant secretary.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have addressed an inquiry to the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the Senate is in session.

Mr. O'GORMAN. With all due respect to the Senator from Connecticut, who seems to have the floor, it must be apparent that he is engaged in a monologue, for he is talking in such an inaudible tone that he can not be heard by a Senator 10 feet from him. This is unusual, because the Senator from Connecticut has a strong, resonant, carrying voice when he desires to be heard.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I decline to yield. If the Senator has a point of order to state, I am willing, of course, that he state it; but I do not yield to the Senator for any other purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I resume reading the bill:

Said secretary and assistant secretary shall hold their offices or connection with the commission at the pleasure of the commission——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WALSH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is a Senator entitled to take the floor and occupy it who speaks in such a manner that it is impossible for anybody to hear him at any reasonable distance away?

Mr. STONE. I make the point of order, with all due respect to my friend, that a Senator occupying the floor can not be taken off the floor by a point of order or by a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will say that a Senator can not be taken off the floor by a parliamentary inquiry, but he certainly can be taken off by a point of order, if the point of order is sustained by the Chair.

Mr. STONE. Upon that, Mr. President, at the proper time—I do not care to interfere at this moment—I should like to submit some rulings of former occupants of the chair, predecessors of the present occupant, and also rulings of the Senate itself upon that very question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will say that I think there will be no trouble in hearing me. If Senators desire to hear me, they will have no difficulty on account of the tone of my voice; but inasmuch as my remarks may perhaps be somewhat extended, I do not propose to try to make more noise single-handed than all the rest of the Senators can make in coordination. I shall conduct myself in a perfectly parliamentary manner; the Senate need not worry about that.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do for a question.

Mr. O'GORMAN. May I ask the Senator from what he is reading?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not wonder the Senator is surprised. This is the first information he has probably had of what is in the bill that is under consideration. I am reading from the Federal trade commission bill.

Each commissioner shall receive a salary of $10,000 per annum——

Mr. O'GORMAN. May I ask the Senator if he thinks he is reading the bill for his own benefit or for the benefit of his colleagues?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. For the benefit of all, including the country.

Mr. O'GORMAN. But the Senator's colleagues can not hear him unless he raises his voice.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My colleagues can hear me if they want to.

Each commissioner shall receive a salary of $10,000 per annum. The secretary of the commission shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum. The assistant secretary shall receive a salary of $4,000 per annum. In case of a vacancy in the office of any commissioner during his term, an appointment shall be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to fill such vacancy, for the unexpired term. The office of the commission shall be in the city of Washington, but the——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I ask for order in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (continuing):

commission may at its pleasure meet and exercise all its powers at any other place and may authorize one or more of its members to prosecute any investigation, and for the purposes thereof to exercise the powers herein given the commission.

The commission shall have such attorneys, accountants, experts, examiners, special agents, and other employees as may from time to time be appropriated for by Congress, and shall have authority to audit their bills and fix their compensation. With the exception of the secretary and assistant secretary and one clerk to each of the commissioners, and such attorneys and experts as may be employed, all employees of the commission shall be a part of the classified civil service. The commission shall also have the power to adopt a seal, which shall be judicially noticed, and to rent suitable rooms for the conduct of its work.

All the expenses of the commission, including all necessary expenses for transportation incurred by the commissioners or by their employees under their orders in making any investigation or upon official business in any other place than in the city of Washington, shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor, approved by the commission.

The Auditor for the State and Other Departments shall receive and examine all accounts of expenditures of the commission.

Witnesses summoned before the commission shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States.

SEC. 3. The commission shal have power among others—

(a) To investigate from time to time, and as often as the commission may deem advisable, the organization, business, financial condition, conduct, practices, and management of any corporation engaged in commerce, and its relation to other corporations and to individuals, associations, and partnerships.

(b) To require any corporation subject to the provisions of this act which the commission may designate to furnish to the commission from time to time information, statements, and records concerning its organization, business, financial condition, conduct, practices, management, and relation to other corporations, or to individuals, associations, or partnerships, and to require the production for examination of all books, documents, correspondence, contracts, memoranda, or other papers relating to or in any way affecting the commerce in which such corporation under inquiry is engaged or concerning its relations to any individual, association, or partnership, and to make copies of the same.

(c) To prescribe as near as may be a uniform system of annual reports from such corporations or classes of corporations subject to the provisions of this act as the commission may designate, and to fix the time for the filing of such reports, and to require such reports, or any special report, to be made under oath, or otherwise in the discretion of the commission.

(d) To make public, in the discretion of the commission, any information obtained by it in the exercise of the powers, authority, and duties conferred upon it by this act, except so far as may be necessary to protect trade processes, names of customers, and such other matters as the commission may deem not to be of public importance, and to make annual and special reports to the Congress and to submit therewith recommendations for additional legislation.

(e) In any suit in equity brought by or under the direction of the Attorney General as provided in the antitrust acts if the court finds for the complainant it may, upon its own motion or the motion of any party to such suit, refer the matter of the form of the decree to be entered to the commission as a master in chancery; whereupon the commission shall proceed in that capacity upon such notice to the parties and upon such hearing as the court may prescribe, and shall as speedily as practicable make report with its findings to the court, which report and findings having been made and filed shall be subject to the judicial procedure established for the consideration and disposition of a master's report and findings in equity cases.

(f) Wherever a restraining order or an interlocutory or final decree has heretofore been entered or shall hereafter be entered against any defendant or defendants in any suit brought by the United States to prvent and restrain any violation of the antitrust acts, the commission shall have power, and it shall be its duty, upon the application of the Attorney General, to make investigation of the manner in which the order or decree has been or is being carried out, and as to whether the same has been or is being violated and what, if any, further order, decree, or relief is advisable. It shall transmit to the Attorney General a report embodying its findings as a result of any such investigation with such recommendations for further action as it may deem advisable and the report shall be made public in the discretion of the commission.

(g) If the commission believes from its inquiries and investigations, instituted upon its own initiative or at the suggestion of the President, the Attorney General, or either House of Congress that any corporation, individual, association, or partnership has violated any law of the United States regulating commerce, it shall report its findings and the evidence in relation thereto to the Attorney General with its recommendations.

For the purpose of prosecuting any investigation or proceeding authorized by this section the commission, or its duly authorized agent or agents, shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy any documents or writings of any corporation being investigated or proceeded against.

(h) The commission is hereby directed to investigate, as expeditionsly as may be, trade conditions in foreign countries where associations, combinations, or practices of buyers, dealers, or traders may injuriously affect the export trade of the United States, and also to investigate whether American exporters have combined with each other or with foreign producers or dealers to control prices abroad, and to report to Congress thereon from time to time.

SEC. 4. The powers and jurisdiction herein conferred upon the commission shall extend over all trade associations, corporate combinations, and corporations as hereinbefore defined engaged in or affecting commerce, except banks and common carriers.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. President, as the Senator is reading this bill for the information of the Senate, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the demand for a call of the Senate for the purpose of establishing the presence of a quorum is not in order. We have just had a call for that purpose, which disclosed a quorum, since which time no business has been transacted; and my point is that until business has been transacted a call for a quorum is not in order. Mere debate, or the continuation of speech making, is not of itself business within the meaning of the rule.

If the Chair has any doubt about it, I have before me or at my hand the ruling of Vice President Fairbanks when the point which I am now making was made before him. He submitted it to the Senate, and the Senate sustained the point. Afterwards, during the same day and subsequent days, the same point that I am now making was made, and the Chair sustained it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has taken occasion to look up the record with reference to this matter. It appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 29, 1908. There was the suggestion of the absence of a quorum, and Mr. Aldrich said:

Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. The suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin is not in order. We have had 32 roll calls within a comparatively short time, all disclosing the presence of a quorum. Manifestly a quorum is in the building. If repeated suggestions of the want of a quorum can be made without intervening business, the whole business of the Senate is put in the hands of one man, who can insist upon continuous calls of the roll upon the question of a quorum. My question of order is that, without the intervention of business, a quorum having been disclosed by a vote or by a call of the roll, no further calls are in order until some business has intervened. I should be glad if the Vice President would submit that question of order to the Senate.

I call the attention of the Chair to a decision in a case which is on all fours with this, made on March 3, 1897, when this precise question was raised by the then Senator from New York, Mr. HILL, who sustained it by the same argument which I am now calling the attention of the Chair to; and the point made by the Senator from New York was sustained. It is found on page 2737 of volume 29, part 3, of the RECORD, second session Fifty-fourth Congress. The language was:

"Mr. HILL. My point is, that the presence of a quorum was determined by the last roll call, and that a Senator can not immediately thereafter suggest the absence of a quorum.

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator mean to embrace the feature that no business has intervened?

"Mr. HILL. Yes; that no business has intervened.

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order."

Then, after the point of order was sustained—and the Chair will not read all of the RECORD—Mr. LA FOLLETTE said:

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I just wish to suggest, in order that it may appear upon the RECORD, that debate has intervened since the last roll call.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is not business.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I just wish that to appear upon the RECORD.

Mr. ALDRICH. My suggestion was that debate was not business.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And I want to remind Senators here to-night, before this vote is taken that every precedent you establish to-night will be brought home to you hereafter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I simply desire to add to what has been said, that if the entire business of the Senate can be put in the hands of one man, that one man could destroy the Government; he could prevent appropriations being made to carry on the governmental machinery, and it is absurd to suppose that it was ever so intended.

I shall not read further from the RECORD; but the question whether debate was business was submitted to the Senate, and by a vote of 35 yeas to 5 nays the point of order was sustained. I find that among the Senators who believed that debate was not business were Senators BRANDEGEE of Connecticut, CLAPP of Minnesota, CLARK of Wyoming, DILLINGHAM of Vermont, DU PONT of Delaware, GALLINGER of New Hampshire, NELSON of Minnesota, SMOOT of Utah, STEPHENSON of Wisconsin, SUTHERLAND of Utah, and WARREN of Wyoming.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, just an observation. I have always been troubled about this rule that a quorum may be called at any time, and I have always felt that there ought to be in some way a modification of it. In this particular instance, however, I will call the attention of the Chair to the fact that more than debate has occurred since a quorum was last called. Points of order have been made; parliamentary inquiries have been raised, and either withdrawn or decided by the Chair, I do not know which; so that a little more than mere debate has intervened since the last call was made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will finish the ruling of the Chair, at least.

Manifestly Vice President Fairbanks was in doubt about the matter, and submitted it to the Senate. The Senate at that time, on the discussion by great parliamentarians and by the vote of great parliamentarians, decided that debate was not business, and that, when a quorum was once disclosed, roll calls were not in order until some business had been transacted by the Senate.

Following the decision of that day by the Senate, upon the following day the same question was raised. It was then decided by Vice President Fairbanks without submission to the Senate, and no appeal was taken to the Senate.

The present occupant of the chair, if called upon to rule, upon first blush, would have taken the same course that Vice President Fairbanks did; but in the light of the authority and the way in which it was settled, the Chair rules that until business has intervened a roll call is not in order.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Connecticut to indulge me for a moment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator ask me to yield to him?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do so.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I did not like the ruling of the Senate when it was made, in 1909, and I am not particularly pleased with it now. I think at the time it was made it was a ruling that represented the resentment of the Senate rather than its judgment. This matter of calling for a quorum can be abused, and frequently is abused; but it is a substantial right, and a resort to it frequently promotes the convenience and dignity of the Senate, and it ought not to be unduly curtailed.

In the particular instance where the ruling referred to by the Chair was made in 1909, it was obvious that a Senator was seeking to occupy time against the distinct will of the majority of the Senate; and that situation was then deemed to justify the imposition of a strict construction of the rule. I think if a similar instance on the facts is presented the same rule ought to be applied. I think practically a similar instance has now been presented. I do not believe the debate indulged in by the Senator from Connecticut up to the present time has been substantial debate. He has been reading simply a copy of the bill that is pending, which everybody has heard read and which everybody has had an opportunity to read. There is not the slightest reason for assuming that its being read at this time is intended to enlighten the Senate, or any Member of it.

I would now commit myself to the declaration that where there has been no substantial debate, where there has been exhibited an obvious purpose to kill time, and the calling of the roll was for the purpose of carrying out that general purpose, I think the rule just announced by the Chair should be applied; but there can be instances, and I have known many of them, where it was an entirely proper proceeding to have the roll called pending an address by a Senator.

Saving for myself just that much of leeway to be hereafter exercised in the event that I shall be confronted with the charge of inconsistency, I take the liberty of making the statement that I now submit.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I go a little further than my friend from Arkansas.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the Senator is discussing a point of order, very well; but I do not want to lose the floor. I yield to the Senator, if he wants to speak in my time. The point of order was raised, and the Chair has ruled, and I assume that I have the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. STONE. The Senator undoubtedly has the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I yield.

Mr. STONE. He did have the floor, and I suppose he still has it. I will ask the Senator to yield to me for the purpose of making a statement to the Chair.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the statement is brief. I, as most Senators with whom I have served here know, have been consistently and persistently opposed to cloture in the Senate. I believe in the largest freedom of real, intelligent, instructive debate, or such as a Senator sincerely means to be such. I would not restrain a Senator in that right of debate in any quantity. Nevertheless, I take the view that a different situation is presented when Senators day after day insist upon making the point of no quorum and calling the roll when it is known, and one roll call after another discloses the fact that there is a quorum, if not actually present in the Senate Chamber, convenient to the Senate Chamber, not only in the city but accessible to the call, and when a call is made a quorum responds to it, showing the presence of a quorum.

We have had the spectacle here for some time past of Senators speaking for a short while, and then some one rising to make the point of no quorum and going through the formality of a roll call, thus consuming considerable time. Then the Senator resumes the floor and his speech, and the same performance is repeated, and so on ad nauseum.

Mr. President, I think the Senate ought to have the right to protect itself against a proceeding of that kind, and when the Senate so protects itself I do not think it is encroaching upon the freedom of debate. It is invoking the rule of procedure established by the vote of the Senate and by the repeated rulings of the Chair to protect itself against the abuse of the right of debate.

My friend from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] says that all we have to do in this case is to apply the law of reason and do a sensible thing that is permissible under parliamentary usage and under the practice of the Senate, as established by the rulings of the Chair and sustained by a vote of the Senate.

I wanted to say just that much, and no more, to let it be known that I put no reservation, as my friend from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] seems to do, on the continuing and unquestioned right of the Senate to invoke the practice to which I have referred, which practice is in accordance with the ruling just made by the Chair. I think it ought to stand without limitation.

While I am on the floor I will make just one further remark: This is not the only abuse to which the Senate is subjected, nor the only abuse that can be corrected by the legitimate ruling of the Chair; and we may have occasion to invoke the rulings heretofore made to protect the Senate against those abuses as they arise in the immediate future.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (reading):

SEC. 5. That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful.

The commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent corporations from using unfair methods of competition in commerce.

Whenever the commission shall have reason to believe that any corporation has been or is using any unfair method of competition in commerce, it shall issue and serve upon such corporation a written order, at least 30 days in advance of the time set therein for hearing, directing it to appear before the commission and show cause why an order shall not be issued by the commission restraining and prohibiting it from using such method of competition, and if upon such hearing the commission shall find that the method of competition in question is prohibited by this act it shall thereupon issue an order restraining and prohibiting the use of the same. The commission may at any time modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any order issued by it under this act.

Whenever the commission, after the issuance of such order, shall find that such corporation has not complied therewith, the commission may petition the district court of the United States, within any district where the method in question was used or where such corporation is located or carries on business, praying the court to issue an injunction to enforce such order of the commission; and the court is hereby authorized to issue such injunction.

SEC. 6. That if any corporation subject to this act shall fail to file any annual or special report, as provided in subdivision (b) of section 3 hereof, within the time fixed by the commission for filing the same, and such failure shall continue for 30 days after notice of such default, the corporation shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every day of the continuance of such failure, which forfeiture shall be payable into the Treasury of the United States, and shall be recoverable in a civil suit in the name of the United States brought in the district where the corporation has its principal office or in any district in which it shall do business. It shall be the duty of the various district attorneys, under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, to prosecute for the recovery of forfeitures. The costs and expenses of such prosecution shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States.

SEC. 7. Any person who shall willfully destroy, alter, mutilate, or remove out of the jurisdiction of the United States or authorize, assist in, or be privy to the willful destruction, alteration, mutilation, or removal out of the jurisdiction of the United States of any book, letter, paper, or document containing an entry or memorandum relating to commerce, the production of which the commission may require under this act, or who shall willfully make any false entry relating to commerce in any book of accounts or record of any trade association, corporate combination, or corporation, subject to the provisions of this act, or who shall willfully make or furnish to said commission or to its agent any false statement, return, or record, knowing the same to be false in any material particular, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Any employee of the commission who divulges any fact or information which may come to his knowledge during the course of his employment by the commission, except in so far as it has been made public by the commission, or as he may be directed by the commission or by a court, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 8. The commission shall have and exercise the powers possessed by the Interstate Commerce Commission to subpœna and compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of evidence, and to administer oaths. All the powers, requirements, obligations, liabilities, and immunities imposed or conferred by the act to regulate commerce, as amended in relation to testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission, shall apply to witnesses, testimony, and evidence before the commission.

SEC. 9. The district courts of the United States, upon the application of the commission alleging a failure by any corporation, or by any of its officers or employees, or by any witness, to comply with any order of the commission for the furnishing of information, shall have jurisdiction to issue such writs, orders, or other process as may be necessary to enforce any order of the commission and to punish the disobedience thereof.

SEC. 10. The several departments and bureaus of the Government, when directed by the President, shall furnish the commission, upon its request, all records, papers, and information in their possession relating to any trade association, corporate combination, or corporation, subject to any of the provisions of this act.

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to create a Federal trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes."

Mr. President, that is the Federal trade commission bill as reported by the Senate committee. It differs radically from the trade commission bill which has passed the House. I ask that the trade commission bill that passed the House may be printed in the RECORD in conjunction with the bill that I have just read to the Senate, and the Clayton bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, it is so ordered. The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[House bill 15613, as passed by the House of Representatives.]

An act (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That a commission is hereby created and established, to be known as the interstate trade commission (hereinafter referred to as the commission), which shall be composed of three commissioners, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Not more than two of the commissioners shall be members of the same political party. The first commissioners appointed shall continue in office for terms of two, four, and six years, respectively, from the date of the taking effect of this act, the term of each to be designated by the President, but their successors shall be appointed for terms of six years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he shall succeed. The commission shall choose a chairman from its own membership. No commissioner shall engage in any other business, vocation, or employment. Any commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. A vacancy in the commission shall not impair the right of the remaining commissioners to exercise all the powers of the commission.

The commission shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed.

SEC. 2. That each commissioner shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year, payable in the same maner as the salaries of the judges of the courts of the United States. The commission shall appoint a secretary, who shall receive a salary of $5,000 a year, payable in like manner, and it shall have authority to employ and fix the compensation of such other officials, clerks, and employees as it may find necessary for the proper performance of its duties and as may be from time to time appropriated for by Congress.

Until otherwise provided by law the commission may rent suitable offices for its use.

All of the expenses of the commission, including all necessary expenses for transportation incurred by the commissioners or by their employees under their orders, in making an investigation, or upon official business in any other places than in the city of Washington, shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the commission.

Witnesses summoned before the commission shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States.

The Auditor for the State and Other Departments shall receive and examine all accounts of expenditures of the commission.

SEC. 3. That upon the organization of the commission and election of its chairman all the existing powers, authority, and duties of the Bureau of Corporations and of the Commissioner of Corporations conferred upon them by the act entitled "An act to establish the Department of Commerce and Labor," approved February 14, 1903, and all amendments thereto, and also those conferred upon them by resolution of the United States Senate passed on March 1, 1913, on May 27, 1913, and on June 18, 1913, shall be vested in the commission.

All clerks and employees of the said bureau shall be transferred to and become clerks and employees of the commission at their present grades and salaries. All records, papers, and property of the said bureau shall become records, papers, and property of the commission, and all unexpended funds and appropriations for the use and maintenance of the said bureau shall become funds and appropriations available to be expended by the commission in the exercise of the powers, authority, and duties conferred on it by this act.

That the Bureau of Corporations and the offices of Commissioner of Corporations and Deputy Commissioner of Corporations are, upon the organization of the commission and the election of its chairman, abolished, and their powers, authority, and duties shall be exercised by the commission free from the direction or control of the Secretary of Commerce.

The information obtained by the commission in the exercise of the powers, authority, and duties conferred upon it by this section may be made public, in the discretion of the commission.

SEC. 4. That the principal office of the commission shall be in the city of Washington, where its general sessions shall be held; but whenever the interest of the public may be promoted, or delay or expense prevented, the commission may hold special sessions in any part of the United States. The commission may, by one or more of its members, or by such officers as it may designate, prosecute any inquiry necessary to its duties in any part of the United States.

SEC. 5. That, with the exception of the secretary and a clerk to each commissioner, all employees of the commission shall be a part of the classified civil service, and shall enter the service under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the commission and by the Civil Service Commission.

SEC. 6. That the words defined in this section shall have the following meaning when found in this act, to wit:

"Commerce" means such commerce as Congress has the power to regulate under the Constitution.

"Corporation" means a body incorporated under law, and also joint-stock associations and all other associations having shares of capital or capital stock or organized to carry on business with a view to profit.

"Capital" means the stocks and bonds issued and the surplus owned by a corporation.

"Antitrust acts" means the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890; also the sections 73 to 77, inclusive, of an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved August 27, 1894; and also the act entitled "An act to amend sections 73 and 76 of the act of August 27, 1894, entitled 'An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,'" approved February 12, 1913.

"Acts to regulate commerce" means the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 14, 1887, and all amendments thereto.

"Documentary evidence" means all documents, papers, and correspondence in existence at and after the passage of this act.

SEC. 7. That the several departments and bureaus of the Government, when directed by the President, shall furnish the commission, upon its request, all records, papers, and information in their possession relating to any corporation subject to any of the provisions of this act, and shall detail from time to time such officials and employees to the commission as he may direct.

SEC. 8. That the commission may from time to time make rules and regulations and classifications of corporations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

The commission may from time to time employ such special attorneys and experts as it may find necessary for the conduct of its work or for proper representation of the public interest in investigations made by it; and the expenses of such employment shall be paid out of the appropriation for the commission.

Any member of the commission may administer oaths and affirmations and sign subpœnas.

The commission may also order testimony to be taken by deposition in any proceeding or investigation pending under this act. Such depositions may be taken before any official authorized to take depositions by the acts to regulate commerce.

Upon the application of the Attorney General of the United States, at the request of the commission, the district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus commanding any person or corporation to comply with the provisions of this act or any order of the commission made in pursuance thereof.

SEC. 9. That every corporation engaged in commerce, excepting corporations subject to the acts to regulate commerce, which, by itself or with one or more other corporations owned, operated, controlled, or organized in conjunction with it so as to constitute substantially a business unit, has a capital of not less than $5,000,000, or, having a less capital, belongs to a class of corporations which the commission may designate, shall furnish to the commission annually such information, statements, and records of its organization, bondholders and stockholders, and financial condition, and also such information, statements, and records of its relation to other corporations and its business and practices while engaged in commerce as the commission shall require; and to enable it the better to carry out the purposes of this act the commission may prescribe as near as may be a uniform system of annual reports. The said annual reports shall contain all the required information and statistics for the period of 12 months ending with the fiscal year of each corporation's report, and they shall be made out under oath or otherwise, in the discretion of the commission, and filed with the commission at its office in Washington within three months after the close of the year for which the report is made, unless additional time be granted in any case by the commission. The commission may also require such special reports as it may deem advisable.

If any corporation subject to this section of this act shall fail to make and file said annual reports within the time above specified, or within the time extended by the commission for making and filing the same, or shall fail to make and file any special report within the time fixed by the order of the commission, such corporation shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every day it shall continue in default in making or filing said annual or special reports. Said forfeitures shall be recovered in the manner provided for the recovery of forfeitures under the provisions of the acts to regulate commerce.

SEC. 10. That upon the direction of the President, the Attorney General, or either House of Congress the commission shall investigate and report the facts relating to any alleged violations of the antitrust acts by any corporation. The report of the commission may include recommendations for readjustment of business in order that the corporation investigated may thereafter maintain its organization, management, and conduct of business in accordance with law. Reports made after investigation under this section may be made public in the discretion of the commission.

For the purpose of prosecuting any investigation or proceeding authorized by this section the commission, or its duly authorized agent or agents, shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy any documentary evidence of any corporation being investigated or proceeded against.

SEC. 11. That when in the course of any investigation made under this act the commission shall obtain information concerning any unfair competition or practice in commerce not necessarily constituting a violation of law by the corporation investigated, it shall make report thereof to the President, to aid him in making recommendations to Congress for legislation in relation to the regulation of commerce, and the information so obtained and the report thereof shall be made public by the commission.

SEC. 12. That in any suit in equity brought by or under the direction of the Attorney General as provided in the antitrust acts, the court may, upon the conclusion of the testimony therein, if it shall be then of opinion that the complainant is entitled to relief, refer said suit to the commission to ascertain and report an appropriate form of decree therein; and upon the coming in of such report such exceptions may be filed and such proceedings had in relation thereto as upon the report of a master in other equity causes; but the court may adopt or reject such report, in whole or in part, and enter such decree as the nature of the case may in its judgment require.

SEC. 13. That wherever a final decree has been entered against any defendant corporation in any suit brought by the United States to prevent and restrain any violation of the antitrust acts, the commission shall have power, and it shall be its duty, upon its own initiative or upon the application of the Attorney General to make investigation of the manner in which the decree has been or is being carried out. It shall transmit to the Attorney General a report embodying its findings as a result of any such investigation, and the report shall be made public in the discretion of the commission.

SEC. 14. That any person who shall willfully make any false entry or statement in any report required to be made under this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be subject to a fine of not more than $5,000 or to imprisonment for not more than three years, or both fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 15. That any officer or employee of the commission who shall make public any information obtained by the commission without its authority or as directed by a court shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 16. That for the purposes of this act and in aid of its powers of investigation herein granted the commission shall have and exercise the same powers conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission in the acts to regulate commerce to subpœna and compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence and to administer oaths. All the requirements, obligations, liabilities, and immunities imposed or conferred by said acts to regulate commerce and by the act in relation to testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission, approved February 11, 1893, and the act defining immunity, approved June 30, 1906, shall apply to witnesses, testimony, and documentary evidence before the commission.

SEC. 17. That the commission shall, on or before the 1st day of December in each year, make a report, which shall be transmitted to Congress. This report shall contain such facts and statistics collected by the commission as may be considered of value in the determination of questions connected with the conduct of commerce by corporations, excepting corporations subject to the acts to regulate commerce, including an abstract of the annual and special reports of corporations made to the commission under section 9 of this act: Provided, That no trade secrets or private lists of customers shall be embraced in any such abstract. The report shall also include such recommendations as to additional legislation as the commission may deem necessary. The commission may also from time to time publish such additional reports or bulletins of facts and statistics relating to corporations engaged in commerce as may be deemed useful and do not violate the provisions of this act.

SEC. 18. That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to prevent or interfere with the Attorney General in enforcing the provisions of the antitrust acts or the acts to regulate commerce.

[House bill 15657, as reported to the Senate.]

An act (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That "antitrust laws," as used herein, includes the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890; sections 73 to 77, inclusive, of an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," of August 27, 1894; an act entitled "An act to amend sections 73 and 76 of the act of August 27, 1894, entitled 'An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,'" approved February 12, 1913; and also this act.

"Commerce," as used herein, means trade or commerce among the several States and with foreign nations, or between the District of Columbia or any Territory of the United States and any State, Territory, or foreign nation, or between any insular possessions or other places under the jurisdiction of the United States, or between any such possession or place and any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia or any foreign nation, or within the District of Columbia or any Territory or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall apply to the Philippine Islands.

The word "person" or "persons" wherever used in this act shall be deemed to include corporations and associations existing under or authorized by the laws of either the United States, the laws of any of the Territories, the laws of any State, or the laws of any foregin country.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce either directly or indirectly to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States, or any Territory thereof, or the District of Columbia, or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, with the purpose or intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor of either such purchaser or seller: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of selling or transportation or discrimination in price in the same or different communities made in good faith to meet competition and not intended to create monopoly: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers in bona fide transactions and not in restraint of trade.

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to lease or make a sale or contract for sale of goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities, whether patented or unpatented, for use, consumption, or resale within the United States, or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from or rebate upon such price, on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities of a competitor or competitors of the lessor or seller.

SEC. 5. That any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

SEC. 6. That a final judgment or decree rendered in any suit or proceeding in equity brought by or on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws to the effect that a defendant has violated said laws shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any suit or proceeding brought by any other party against such defendant under said laws as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto.

Any person may be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any offense under the antitrust laws, and any suit arising under those laws may be maintained if the indictment is found or the suit is brought within six years next after the occurrence of the act or cause of action complained of, any statute of limitation or other provision of law heretofore enacted to the contrary notwithstanding. Whenever any suit or proceeding in equity is instituted by the United States to prevent or restrain violations of any of the antitrust laws the running of the statute of limitations in respect of each and every private right of action arising under said laws and based in whole or in part on any matter complained of in said suit or proceeding shall be suspended during the pendency thereof: Provided, That this shall not be held to extend the statute of limitations in the case of offenses heretofore committed.

SEC. 7. That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade, under the antitrust laws.

SEC. 8. That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce where the effect of such acquisition is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

No corporation shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of two or more corporations engaged in commerce where the effect of such acquisition, or the use of such stock by the voting or granting of proxies or otherwise, is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition between such corporations, or any of them, whose stock or other share capital is so acquired, or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

This section shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment and not using the same by voting or otherwise to bring about, or in attempting to bring about, the substantial lessening of competition. Nor shall anything contained in this section prevent a corporation engaged in commerce from causing the formation of subsidiary corporations for the actual carrying on of their immediate lawful business, or the natural and legitimate branches or extensions thereof, or from owning and holding all or a part of the stock of such subsidiary corporations, when the effect of such formation is not to eliminate or substantially lessen competition.

Nor shall anything herein contained be construed to prohibit any common carrier subject to the laws to regulate commerce from aiding in the construction of branches or short lines so located as to become feeders to the main line of the company so aiding in such construction or from acquiring or owning all or any part of the stock of such branch lines, nor to prevent any such common carrier from acquiring and owning all or any part of the stock of a branch or short line constructed by an independent company where there is no substantial competition between the company owning the branch line so constructed and the company owning the main line acquiring the property or an interest therein nor to prevent such common carrier from extending any of its lines through the medium of the acquisition of stock or otherwise of any other such common carrier where there is no substantial competition between the company extending its lines and the company whose stock, property, or an interest therein is so acquired.

Nothing contained in this section shall be held to affect or impair any right heretofore legally acquired: Provided, That nothing herein shall be held or construed to authorize or make lawful anything prohibited and made illegal by the antitrust laws.

SEC. 9. After two years from the approval of this act no common carrier engaged in commerce having upon its board of directors or as its president, manager, or purchasing officer or agent any person who is at the same time an officer, director, manager, or general agent of, or who has any direct or indirect interest in, another corporation, firm, partnership, or association, with which latter corporation, firm, partnership, or association, or with such person such common carrier shall make purchases of supplies or articles of commerce or have any dealings in securities, railroad supplies, or other articles of commerce or contracts for construction or maintenance of any kind with any such corporation, firm, partnership, or association to the amount of more than $50,000 in any one year, unless and except such purchases shall be made from or such dealings shall be with the bidder whose bid is the most favorable to such common carrier, to be ascertained by competitive bidding after public notice published in a newspaper or newspapers of general circulation, to be named and the time, character and scope of the publication to be prescribed by rule or otherwise by the Interstate Commerce Commission. No bid shall be received unless the names and addresses of the officers, directors, and general managers thereof, if it be a corporation, or of the members, if it be a partnership or firm, be given with the bid.

Any person who shall, directly or indirectly, do or attempt to do anything to prevent anyone from bidding or shall do any act to prevent free and fair competition among the bidders or those desiring to bid shall be punished as prescribed in this section.

Every such common carrier having any such transactions or making any such purchases shall within 10 days after making the same file with the Interstate Commerce Commission a full and detailed statement of the transaction showing the manner and time of the advertisement given for competition, who were the bidders, and the names and addresses of the directors and officers of the corporations and the members of the firm or partnership bidding; and whenever the said commission shall have reason to believe that the law has been violated in and about the said purchases or transactions it shall transmit all papers and documents and its own views or findings regarding the transaction to the Attorney General.

If any common carrier shall violate this section, every director or officer thereof who shall have knowingly voted for or directed the act constituting such violation or who shall have aided or abetted in such violation shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not exceeding $25,000 and confined in jail not exceeding two years, in the discretion of the court.

That from and after two years from the date of the approval of this act no person at the same time shall be a director in any two or more corporations, any one of which has capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $1,000,000, engaged in whole or in part in commerce, other than common carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, if such corporations are or shall have been theretofore, by virtue of their business and location of operation, competitors, so that the elimination of competition by agreement between them would constitute a violation of any of the provisions of any of the antitrust laws. The eligibility of a director under the foregoing provision shall be determined by the aggregate amount of the capital, surplus, and undivided profits, exclusive of dividends declared but not paid to stockholders, at the end of the fiscal year of said corporation next preceding the election of directors, and when a director has been elected in accordance with the provisions of this act it shall be lawful for him to continue as such for one year thereafter.

When any person elected or chosen as a director or officer or selected as an employee of any corporation subject to the provisions of this act is eligible at the time of his election or selection to act for such corporation in such capacity, his eligibility to act in such capacity shall not be affected, and he shall not become or be deemed amenable to any of the provisions hereof by reason of any change in the affairs of such corporation from whatsoever cause, whether specifically excepted by any of the provisions hereof or not, until the expiration of one year from the date of his election or employment.

SEC. 9a. Every president, director, officer, or manager of any firm, association, or corporation engaged in commerce as a common carrier who embezzles, steals, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds, credits, securities, property, or assets of such firm, association, or corporation, or willfully or knowingly converts the same to his own use or to the use of another, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and upon conviction shall be fined not less than $500 or confined in the penitentiary not less than 1 year nor more than 10 years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Prosecutions hereunder may be in the district court of the United States for the district wherein the offense may have been committed.

SEC. 9b. That authority to enforce compliance with the provisions of sections 2, 4, 8, and 9 of this act by the corporations, associations, partnerships, and individuals respectively subject thereto is hereby vested: In the Interstate Commerce Commission where applicable to common carriers and in the Federal trade commission where applicable to all other character of commerce, to be exercised as follows:

Whenever the commission vested with jurisdiction thereof has reason to believe, either upon information furnished by its agents or employees or upon complaint, duly verified by affidavit, of any interested person, that any corporation, association, partnership, or individual is violating any of the provisions of sections 2, 4, 8, and 9 of this act, it shall issue and cause to be served a notice, accompanied with a written statement of the violation charged, upon such corporation, association, partnership, or individual, who shall thereupon be called upon, within a reasonable time fixed in such notice, not to exceed 30 days thereafter, to appear and show cause why an order should not issue to restrain and prohibit the violation charged. If upon a hearing held pursuant to such notice it shall appear to the commission that any of the provisions of said sections have been or are being violated, then it shall issue and cause to be served an order commanding such corporation, association, partnership, or individual forthwith to cease and desist from such violation, and to transfer or dispose of the stock or resign from the directorships held contrary to the provisions of sections 8 or 9, as the case may be, within the time and in the manner prescribed in said order. Any such order may be modified or set aside at any time by the commission issuing it for good cause shown.

If any corporation, association, partnership, or individual charged with obedience thereto fails and neglects to obey any such order of a commission, the said commission, by its attorneys, if any it has, or by the appropriate district attorney acting under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, may apply for an enforcement of such order to the district court of the United States for the district wherein such corporation, association, partnership, or individual is an inhabitant or may be found or transacts any business, and therewith transmit to the said court the original record in the proceeding, including all the testimony taken therein and the report and order of the commission. Upon the filing of the record, the court shall have jurisdiction of the proceeding and of the questions determined therein and shall have power to make and to enter upon the pleadings, testimony, and proceedings such orders and decrees as may be just and equitable.

On motion of the commission and on such notice as the court shall deem reasonable, the court shall set down the cause for summary final hearing. Upon such final hearing the finding of the commission shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, but if either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the proceeding before the commission, the court may allow such additional evidence to be taken before the commission or before a master appointed by the court and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem just.

Disobedience to any order or decree which may be made in any such proceeding or any injunction or other process issued therein shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100 a day during the continuance of such disobedience or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Any party to any proceeding brought under the provisions of this section before either the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Federal trade commission, including the person upon whose complaint such proceeding shall have been begun, as well as the United States by and through the Attorney General thereof, may appeal from any final order made by either of such commissions to any court having jurisdiction to enforce any order which might have been made upon application of such commission as hereinbefore provided, at any time within 90 days from the date of the entry of the order appealed from, by serving notice upon the adverse party and filing the same with the said commission; and thereupon the same proceedings shall be had as prescribed herein in the case of an application by the same commission for the enforcement of its order as hereinbefore provided.

Any final order or decree made by any district court in any proceeding brought under this section may be reviewed by the Supreme Court upon appeal, as in cases in equity, taken within 90 days from the entry of such order or decree.

SEC. 10. That any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also any district wherein it may be found or transacts any business; and all process in such cases may be served in the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found.

SEC. 11. That in any suit, action, or proceeding brought by or on behalf of the United States subpœnas for witnesses who are required to attend a court of the United States in any judicial district in any case, civil or criminal, arising under the antitrust laws may run into any other district.

SEC. 12. That every director, officer, or agent of a corporation which shall violate any of the penal provisions of the antitrust laws, who shall have aided, abetted, counseled, commanded, induced, or procured such violation, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction therefor of any such director, officer, or agent he shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 13. That the several district courts of the United States are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of this act, and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations. Such proceedings may be by way of petition setting forth the case and praying that such violation shall be enjoined or otherwise prohibited. When the parties complained of shall have been duly notified of such petition, the court shall proceed, as soon as may be, to the hearing and determination of the case; and pending such petition, and before final decree, the court may at any time make such temporary restraining order or prohibition as shall be deemed just in the premises. Whenever it shall appear to the court before which any such proceeding may be pending that the ends of justice require that other parties should be brought before the court, the court may cause them to be summoned, whether they reside in the district in which the court is held or not, and subpœnas to that end may be served in any district by the marshal thereof.

SEC. 14. That any person, firm, corporation, or association shall be entitled to sue for and have injunctive relief, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction over the parties, against threatened loss or damage by a violation of the antitrust laws, including sections 2, 4, 8, and 9 of this act, when and under the same conditions and principles as injunctive relief against threatened conduct that will cause loss or damage is granted by courts of equity, under the rules governing such proceedings, and upon the execution of proper bond against damages for an injunction improvidently granted and a showing that the danger of irreparable loss or damage is immediate, a preliminary injunction may issue.

SEC. 15. That no preliminary injunction shall be issued without notice to the opposite party.

No temporary restraining order shall be granted without notice to the opposite party unless it shall clearly appear from specific facts shown by affidavit or by the verified bill that immediate and irreparable injury, loss, or damage will result to the applicant before notice can be served and a hearing had thereon. Every such temporary restraining order shall be indorsed with the date and hour of issuance, shall be forthwith filed in the clerk's office and entered of record, shall define the injury and state why it is irreparable and why the order was granted without notice, and shall by its terms expire within such time after entry, not to exceed 10 days, as the court or judge may fix, unless within the time so fixed the order is extended for a like period for good cause shown, and the reasons for such extension shall be entered of record. In case a temporary restraining order shall be granted without notice in the contingency specified, the matter of the issuance of a preliminary injunction shall be set down for a hearing at the earliest possible time and shall take precedence of all matters except older matters of the same character; and when the same comes up for hearing the party obtaining the temporary restraining order shall proceed with the application for a preliminary injunction, and if he does not do so the court shall dissolve the temporary restraining order. Upon two days' notice to the party obtaining such temporary restraining order the opposite party may appear and move the dissolution or modification of the order, and in that event the court or judge shall proceed to hear and determine the motion as expeditiously as the ends of justice may require.

Section 263 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, is hereby repealed.

Nothing in this section contained shall be deemed to alter, repeal, or amend section 266 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

SEC. 16. That no restraining order or interlocutory order of injunction shall issue, except upon the giving of security by the applicant in such sum as the court or judge may deem proper, conditioned upon the payment of such costs and damages as may be incurred or suffered by any party who may be found to have been wrongfully enjoined or restrained thereby.

SEC. 17. That every order of injunction or restraining order shall set forth the reasons for the issuance of the same, shall be specific in terms, and shall describe in reasonable detail, and not by reference to the bill of complaint or other document, the act or acts sought to be restrained, and shall be binding only upon the parties to the suit, their officers, agents, servants, employees, and attorneys, or those in active concert or participating with them, and who shall, by personal service or otherwise, have received actual notice of the same.

SEC. 18. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving, or growing out of, a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property, or to a property right, of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be described with particularity in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

And no such restraining order or injuction shall prohibit any person or persons whether singly or in concert from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working; or from withholding their patronage from any party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful and lawful means so to do; or from paying or giving to, or withholding from, any person engaged in such dispute, any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value; or from peaceably assembling in a lawful manner, and for lawful purposes; or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto; nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held to be violations of the antitrust laws.

SEC. 19. That any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of any district court of the United States or any court of the District of Columbia by doing any act or thing therein, or thereby forbidden to be done by him, if the act or thing so done by him be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States, or under the laws of any State in which the act was committed, shall be proceeded against for his said contempt as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 20. That whenever it shall be made to appear to any district court or judge thereof, or to any judge therein sitting, by the return of a proper officer on lawful process, or upon the affidavit of some credible person, or by information filed by any district attorney, that there is reasonable ground to believe that any person has been guilty of such contempt, the court or judge thereof, or any judge therein sitting, may issue a rule requiring the said person so charged to show cause upon a day certain why he should not be punished therefor, which rule, together with a copy of the affidavit or information, shall be served upon the person charged, with sufficient promptness to enable him to prepare for and make return to the order at the time fixed therein. If upon or by such return, in the judgment of the court, the alleged contempt be not sufficiently purged, a trial shall be directed at a time and place fixed by the court: Provided, however, That if the accused, being a natural person, fail or refuse to make return to the rule to show cause, an attachment may issue against his person to compel an answer, and in case of his continued failure or refusal, or if for any reason it be impracticable to dispose of the matter on the return day, he may be required to give reasonable bail for his attendance at the trial and his submission to the final judgment of the court. Where the accused is a body corporate, an attachment for the sequestration of its property may be issued upon like refusal or failure to answer.

In all cases within the purview of this act such trial may be by the court, or, upon demand of the accused, by a jury; in which latter event the court may impanel a jury from the jurors then in attendance, or the court or the judge thereof in chambers may cause a sufficient number of jurors to be selected and summoned, as provided by law, to attend at the time and place of trial, at which time a jury shall be selected and impaneled as upon a trial for misdemeanor; and such trial shall conform as near as may be to the practice in criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or upon information.

If the accused be found guilty, judgment shall be entered accordingly, prescribing the punishment, either by fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court. Such fine shall be paid to the United States or to the complainant or other party injured by the act constituting the contempt, or may, where more than one is so damaged, be divided or apportioned among them as the court may direct, but in no case shall the fine to be paid to the United States exceed, in case the accused is a natural person, the sum of $1,000, nor shall such imprisonment exceed the term of six months: Provided, That in any case the court or a judge thereof may, for good cause shown, by affidavit or proof taken in open court or before such judge and filed with the papers in the case, dispense with the rule to show cause, and may issue an attachment for the arrest of the person charged with contempt; in which event such person, when arrested, shall be brought before such court or a judge thereof without unnecessary delay and shall be admitted to bail in a reasonable penalty for his appearance to answer to the charge or for trial for the contempt; and thereafter the proceedings shall be the same as provided herein in case the rule had issued in the first instance.

SEC. 21. That the evidence taken upon the trial of any persons so accused may be preserved by bill of exceptions, and any judgment of conviction may be reviewed upon writ of error in all respects as now provided by law in criminal cases, and may be affirmed, reversed, or modified as justice may require. Upon the granting of such writ of error, execution of judgment shall be stayed, and the accused, if thereby sentenced to imprisonment, shall be admitted to bail in such reasonable sum as may be required by the court, or by any justice, or any judge of any district court of the United States or any court of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 22. That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of, or on behalf of, the United States, but the same, and all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced within section 19 of this act, may be punished in conformity to the usages at law and in equity now prevailing.

SEC. 23. That no proceeding for contempt shall be instituted against any person unless begun within one year from the date of the act complained of; nor shall any such proceeding be a bar to any criminal prosecution for the same act or acts; but nothing herein contained shall affect any proceedings in contempt pending at the time of the passage of this act.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Clayton bill should be considered at the same time that the Federal trade commission bill is considered. They are interrelated. The Clayton bill itself imposes certain duties upon the commission to execute, and nobody can intelligently comprehend the class of legislation hereby contemplated, or the effect of the legislation, unless he considers both bills at the same time.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the interstate commission bill, not only to section 5 of it but to the entire proposition of erecting a Federal trade commission in this country. I see no reason whatever for inflicting that sort of a burden upon the varied business interests of the land. There is at present a Commissioner of Corporations. He has many of the powers given to this Federal trade commission, but this proposition is to abolish the office of Commissioner of Corporations and confer all the powers that the present commissioner has and all his duties and others upon this expensive Federal trade commission.

In all seriousness, what demand is there in the country for the creation of a commission sitting here at Washington, the members of which are to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate and who are to be paid $10,000 a year each? Would any man manage his private business, no matter how extensive, by a commission with such an absurdity as that?

The Senator from Nevada who reports this bill says that the commission will only investigate or exercise its powers over a very few of the vast number of corporations which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] showed by the statistics were to be subjected to this commission. Mr. President, if there is any such intention as that to limit the powers of the commission, it should be expressed in the bill. If it is only the intention to have this commission exercise jurisdiction over corporations whose gross receipts are a million or five million dollars, or to have the number of corporations subject to its jurisdiction limited in any other way, the bill should say so.

But the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in opening the debate on this question the other day called the attention of the Senate and the country to what is happening in this country. The Government, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, exercises jurisdiction over all the interstate transportation of the country; the Government, through the Federal Reserve Board, has reached out and taken control of the entire banking and currency system of the country; and now it is proposed to set up this great Federal commission of five commissioners at $10,000 a year here in Washington to take control of all the private business of the people of this country which is conducted in corporate form, embracing trade associations and partnerships or any other combinations of citizens or of capital if they have capital stock.

It seems to me the creation of this commission is really embarking this Government upon a socialistic program of government. What is there to be left that is not regulated by the Government here at Washington? Mind you, Mr. President, this is all to be done under the commerce clause of the Constitution. The Constitution gives Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States. Everyone who is familiar with the reasons for putting that clause into the Constitution knows that it was put there for the purpose of keeping the channels of commerce among the States open and free from obstruction. The attention of the founders of the Government and the makers of the Constitution had been drawn to the fact that the old articles of confederation left the State of New York with authority to block South Carolina from the use of the Hudson River, the State of Connecticut to prohibit the State of Georgia from the use of the Connecticut River, and the object of conferring upon Congress the authority to regulate commerce among the States was to keep the great arteries of commerce among the States free from obstruction.

If the founders of the Constitution had been told that in the year 1914 the Congress of the United States was to be invoked to set up a Federal commission in Washington to order about private business men engaged in the thousands of occupations which engross the attention of the business men in this country, to tell them in what method they might compete among themselves for business, and how their salesmen should act out upon the road in getting contracts and orders, and that this Federal commission here in Washington was to have authority to send out its inspectors and examine and order the private business men in this country in their own offices to open their safes, their private letter books, reveal their correspondence, their contracts, their agreements with each other, to the inspection of a man bearing a card from this Federal commission here in Washington, they would have stood aghast at such a contention.

Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States provides in the fourth amendment:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized.

This bill provides that in any case this commission takes up for investigation all the documents and private papers of the party the commission thinks may be indulging in an unfair method of competition shall be open to the inspection of this Federal commission here in Washington.

The Democratic Party heretofore has claimed to be a party that believes in some personal liberty in this country. They were against sumptuary laws; they were against inquisitorial proceedings; they were against the concentration of power here in Washington. They had some respect for State rights. They had some idea that their own constituents at home were capable of doing some things for themselves. But if the Government is to manage the private business affairs of this country as they have managed the railroad affairs of this country, then I think the people will uprise and overthrow this whole theory of commission government here in Washington. It will become intolerable. What activity in the United States of America is left to the people? All the transportation is controlled by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is now proposed to control the issue of securities by the railroads chartered by the States by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I think it may be a good thing, if we have the power to do it, for the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is a commission already existing, to exercise some supervision over the question of securities by the railroads chartered by the States; but there is a grave question in my mind whether, under the Constitution, we have the power to do it. Whether the regulation of the issuing of the securities necessary for the building of the railroads chartered by a State is the regulation of an instrumentality of commerce among the States in the view of the Constitution may be, and is in my opinion, a very doubtful question. But if they can do that; if the Interstate Commerce Commission can say to the railroads at what price they shall sell what they have to sell, how many securities they shall issue, whether they shall be allowed to take in any other lines of railroad, and, if so, which railroads shall be allowed to take in another line, and where they shall build, and what securities they shall issue, and at what price they shall be marketed—if those things can be done by the Interstate Commerce Commission, then, with everything that the railroad company has to buy controlled by other powers beyond its control, with the board of directors, with what it has to sell fixed by the Government, with what it has to buy fixed by powers beyond its control, with the stockholders asking them to earn a dividend between the income and the outgo fixed by a power beyond their authority, the state of the railroads is indeed a bad one, because the Interstate Commerce Commission becomes practically the board of directors of the operating railroad corporation, and because the Government of the United States, acting through its Interstate Commerce Commission, is in fact operating the railroads by ordering the directors how to operate them, and the private people who own the stocks and securities of those roads, and their directors, who are their trustees and servants, are prevented from managing the property of the stockholders as they think it should be managed or for their own benefit, and the control of the Government is substituted for that of the owners.

But the Government declines to assume the deficit or the liability or the result of the management that it itself imposes upon the railroads.

Now, all the finances of the country are to be controlled by this other Government commission. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we have seen in the last few days one of the difficulties that is going to arise in this country if the country is to be governed by commissions. The things that we are putting commissions in charge of are fundamental things. The transportation of the country is fundamental. The currency, the lifeblood of the commerce of the country, is fundamental. We have decided that it shall be done by a commission, a Federal Reserve Board. We have not yet been able to fill the commission.

What will be the character of the commission if we are now to set up a Federal trade commission to manage all the other business of the country which is in corporate form? For let no one think that only the big trusts are going to be managed by this Federal trade commission. There is nothing in the bill about a trust. There is nothing in the bill about a monopoly. There is nothing in the bill about the Sherman law, except that if the commission thinks it has been violated they shall so advise the Attorney General, who already has that duty imposed on him by law.

The bill operates upon corporations engaged in commerce, which commerce is to be defined as that commerce which Congress has the power to regulate, which is commerce among the States. What corporation that is doing a business of $10,000 a year is not engaged in commerce among the States? There is no corporation but what is engaged in commerce among the States in these days. Either they buy their raw material or they sell their manufactured product beyond the State line. There is no corporation so small but what it is buying or selling something over State lines.

Now, what sort of men will be put on this Federal trade commission if it is created with these powers? The President is to choose them. Who will satisfy the Senate of the United States and the business of the United States to sit in judgment with this arbitrary and indefinite authority of saying what is fair or what is unfair and what the power to issue their peremptory order for one of these corporations to stop doing what in the opinion of three out of five of these men is unfair?

Mr. President, if that authority is ever given to anybody in this country, we have ceased to be a free country. The opinions of the business men are at variance. What would Mr. Jones, who was a candidate for the Federal Reserve Board here, with his ideas about the methods of competition indulged in by the Harvester Trust, which he says he approves of, consider to be an unfair method of competition? He says he thinks what he is doing now is fair. What would a great business man like George W. Perkins, if he were appointed on the Federal trade commission, say about practices which are fair or unfair? What sort of men are to be placed on the board? If men who approve of the large business units and of the present methods of operation of the great corporations of this country are to be excluded from the membership of the board, what sort of men are to be put on the board? What is to happen if a complaint is made before this Federal commission that the Harvester Trust is engaged in an unfair method of competition, and the commission, after inspecting the whole process which constitutes the method and their acts, say that it is a fair method of competition? Is, then, the Attorney General and the Department of Justice to file a suit against them under the Sherman law if there is criticism of the opinion of the Federal trade commission? Are these people who have been adjudged to be in fair competition by the Federal trade commission to be sent to jail for violating the Sherman law as committing a restraint of trade? Of what use is this commission, then, in removing from the minds of the business men of the country the apprehension that they may be violating the law?

Mr. President, the business men of this country have asked for some sort of a commission which would give them relief from the restrictions and limitations placed upon them by the Sherman law. That was the origin of the demand for a trade commission. That was what the Progressive platform demanded. That was what the great majority of the witnesses said who appeared before the Interstate Commerce Committee in response to the resolution introduced by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] calling upon Congress to say whether any other legislation was necessary in relation to the Sherman law. They all said that they wanted a commission which would authorize agreements. All sorts of methods were proposed there. If I remember correctly, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] advocated a plan which had been suggested by some gentleman in New York whose name now escapes me, who had given great attention to this question, by which Congress should prohibit from interstate commerce corporations that were chartered by the respective States with powers that did not accord with some standards that the national law was to lay down. That was one way of preventing the operations of trusts and of making it plain what business men could do. But there were a thousand ways suggested. The minds of the business men of this country are not made up upon this question at all.

The Commissioner of Corporations a few years ago wrote a letter to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce which he has made a part of his report, and that Commissioner of Corporations, after his experience in the office, among the suggestions that he had to make, said:

> Shall an interstate trade commission be organized?
> If the work is to be simply that of investigation and publicity, my experience would indicate that an organization under a single head would be decidedly more efficient.

That is just where the Commissioner of Corporations has it now. Then, in discussing whether any sort of quasi judicial power should be attempted to be conferred upon this commission, he said:

> Thus, as stated in paragraph 5 above, rules of action and grounds for cancellation of registration should be set forth in the bill itself, with sufficient definition to make clear the intention of Congress as to the class of acts to be covered thereby. For example, the word "overcapitalization" is perhaps sufficiently definite in itself, while "unfair or oppressive methods of competition" would perhaps be too indefinite.

He knows it is too indefinite. The decisions and authorities which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has put into his report are from the courts, where they have upheld certain duties imposed upon commissions created by Congress as not being clear delegations of legislative authority and are not at all in point as to the construction of this phrase "unfair competition." In every one of these authorities the court has held that the Congress must prescribe the primary standard or rule within which the commission may exercise its discretion in taking up the particular objects to come within the rule.

There is no rule whatever laid down here. This bill does not accord with the recommendations of the President of the United States in his message to Congress. The President asked the Congress to lay down the definite rule by which business men should be governed. That is a law. This lays down no rule.

If they who claim that the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is right, that unfair competition has a definite meaning in the law, that it means something, that there must be the element of deceit or fraud or attempt to impose upon somebody in order to make it unfair to bring it within the decisions of the courts upon that subject—if that is what is proposed to be conferred upon this Federal trade commission, then it is a clear attempt by the legislative branch of the Government to impose judicial powers now exercised by the judiciary upon this executive administrative commission.

If "unfair" means something else less defined than that—if it means, as the Senator from Iowa said the other day, what it means as used in the English language—then it means what the dictionaries say "unfair" means in the English language. If anyone will look in the dictionary, as I did the other day, and put into the RECORD the definitions and synonyms given by even but one dictionary of what "unfair" means in the English language, this commission is sent out to roam the fields of fancy and to extract any meaning they choose to give, provided it can be found in the dictionary after the use of the word "unfair," if that loose term, as thus popularly used, is to be the guide of this commission, and there is no use in passing this section 5 unless it is to be. Then it would be intolerable to any American people to be governed by what three out of five men about whose appointment they have nothing to say should guess, from instance to instance and from day to day, about what that word might mean.

It is not proposed to confer this judicial power or even any quasi judicial power upon this Federal trade commission; there is no excuse whatever for the creation of it. The commission would degenerate simply into a smelling committee, to be dragged around to investigate people who were complained of by their competitors. As I said, if private business, charged with no use of common carriers at all, simply because it operates beyond State lines, is to have this Federal commission imposed upon it as its guide and as its boss, you will simply raise up in this country such a protest against the whole idea of government by commission as was never seen in the country before, and it ought to rise up. I have sufficient confidence in the independence, in the virility, in the high respect of the ordinary American citizen to be confident that after what he has been through to obtain liberty, guaranteed by law and constitutional limitations, he will never submit to government by irresponsible commission of that nature. It is nothing but despotism, Mr. President, in a free country, from start to finish.

As provided by this bill, there is no opportunity for any judicial power to be exercised from the time a complaint is made of unfair competition until the time when the man against whom the complaint was made finds himself in jail. There has been no exercise of judicial power if this commission as thus constituted can be sustained in law. That can not exist in a free country. That leaves it to the Executive to appoint commissioners and put men in prison. Of course they can always find something in their judgment to be unfair, but the people will not tolerate to be governed by method, because here are commissioners to be appointed for terms of seven years.

The period of their tenure of office outlasts three terms of a Member of the lower House of Congress from his home district. It overlaps an entire senatorial term. It covers nearly all presidential terms. To whom are these commissioners responsible? There has been a great movement in this country and a great outcry about restoring the Government to the people. Is that restoring the Government to the people? That is taking the Government away from the people. That is erecting a Frankenstein and breathing the breath of life into it and turning it loose upon this country, responsible to no one. If they could have their way, they would prevent the courts from enjoining this commission. They want the mere ipse dixit of this commission to be final and conclusive in the premises.

Some people have thought they could remedy the glaring defects of section 5 by providing for some sort of a court review of the findings of the commission, and there are amendments pending here, offered by various Senators, to certify the record from the commission, together with all the testimony, to a judge of a United States court and have him examine the testimony that was taken and the decision to which the commission has come, and to have it reviewed, to have another trial about it; but the obvious answer to all that circumlocution is, if you have got to go into court and have a trial as to whether a method of competition is fair or unfair, why send a man around by this circuitous route? Why compel him to go to the trade commission and undergo a trial, and then have him go to court about it, where he can go now, before you ever establish a commission? What is the sense in that?

To be sure, the bill sets up five new grandees in this country at $10,000 apiece—Federal trade commissioners—at the expense of the Government; it provides $50,000 for this tribunal, to begin with, irrespective of any of its accouterments, or of any of its attachments, or of any of its vast army of field agents and inspectors and detectives. The cost of this commission, if it justifies its existence in its activities, will be perfectly tremendous, Mr. President, and will increase from year to year beyond all bounds. We know to what extent the Forestry Service developed under a previous administration.

These five commissioners, some people think, would simply attack or inspect or investigate the greatest of the existing corporations, but if they do only that, they are denying the relief that the proponents of this bill claim should be extended to all, to the largest number of people who claim they have been aggrieved in the country, because it is not a question of the amount of business that is done by a corporation or the extent of its capital stock; the question is, Is the method of competition fair or unfair? It is the moral quality of the act. Whether the complainant be an individual or a rival corporation, if this tribunal is to sit there to do justice, it has to hear his case as well as the case of the Standard Oil or the Tobacco Corporation or the Harvester Trust.

Mr. President, these three or four bills, or whatever the number of them may be, have been tagged by a name which is intended to appeal to the people who are against trusts; they are called trust bills. They go out to the country as though they were bills to hurt the great trusts. Well, this Federal trade-commission bill is in no sense an antitrust bill. As the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has observed, the trusts can flourish under that bill to their heart's content. It is not to be supposed that the commission would find one method fair if it were practiced by a trust and another unfair if it were practiced by some corporation that was not big enough in their opinion to be called a trust. The moral quality of the act will be the same, no matter by whom it is committed. Therefore, this commission, to justify its existence and to get the people to permit it to exist, will have to get busy. Those who think it will not be doing anything, in my opinion, are very much mistaken.

To the few business men who favor this bill, I can wish no greater calamity than to have it imposed upon them. Of course most of them do not know what it is; of course later on, if the bill should be passed, the very business men who have supposed they were for it will be coming to us and saying, "What in the name of heaven did you allow that thing to get through for? What did you ever set it up in this country for?" When you respond to them, "Why, you signed a petition for that bill; you asked that a law be passed so that you could know exactly what you could do and what you must not do," they will say, "Oh, well, you know I belong to the So-and-so Chamber of Commerce and the United States Chamber of Commerce, who had their committee in Washington send us around a form to approve favoring a Federal trade commission bill, and we got the secretary and the treasurer and the president together and unanimously adopted a resolution and sent it on to the United States Chamber of Commerce, and they published it in a very handsome pamphlet; but we did not know anything about it. We supposed, of course, they knew their business and would not ask for any kind of a trade commission that was going to be a persecution, a kind of a hairshirt, instead of a salve or a poultice to us. We thought they knew their business, and we thought you knew your business. We elected you to go down there and make laws for us; we did not suppose you would be bothered by any action we might take in order to save our faces and to stand well with the agitators, who get national prominence and conspicuity by hanging around Washington and keeping the Printing Office going with their suggestions and amendments and polings. We did not suppose you would pay much attention to those things and you ought not to have done so." And they will be right about it.

There is not any demand for this bill in the country. If so, where is it? Of course, the Senators who are on the committee which reported the bill, and who have perpetrated it, have got to stand by it and have got to claim that there is somewhere a tremendous uprising for this new imposition to be set up here, to prove the truth of the declaration of the fathers of the Democratic Party that that government governs best which governs least and minds its own business and lets its citizens try to make a living in their own way so long as they do not violate the law. Therefore we set up this commission of busybodies.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the Senator from Connecticut is engaged in a very interesting discussion of the merits of this legislation. There is far from being a quorum in the Chamber. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts makes the point that no quorum is present. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Nelson	Smoot
Bankhead	Gronna	Newlands	Stone
Brady	Hollis	Norris	Swanson
Brandegee	Hughes	Overman	Thomas
Bristow	Jones	Owen	Thornton
Bryan	Kenyon	Page	Tillman
Camden	Kern	Perkins	Vardaman
Catron	Lane	Pomerene	Walsh
Chamberlain	Lea, Tenn.	Reed	Weeks
Clapp	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	West
Clark, Wyo.	Lewis	Sheppard	White
Clarke, Ark.	Martin, Va.	Simmons	Williams
Crawford	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.
Cummins	Myers	Smith, Md.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired. This announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I think I have the floor.

Mr. STONE. I rise to make a statement.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before the Senator does so——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STONE. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. STONE. I am not asking the consent of the Senator. My position is that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] is not entitled to proceed, as he has forfeited his right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For what reason?

Mr. STONE. I will state the reason, if the Chair will be patient for a moment.

The rules provide that no Senator can speak more than twice on a question before the Senate during the same legislative day. The Senator from Connecticut, while addressing the Senate this morning, yielded the floor; another matter was debated in the form of a parliamentary inquiry, and a point of order was made. The Senator resumed the floor and has yielded the second time, in order that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] might make the point that no quorum was present, which the Chair ought, in my judgment, to have ruled out of order. The Chair ought to have ruled it out of order because 30 minutes ago the Vice President, while in the chair, decided that the presence of a quorum having been disclosed on a previous roll call a second roll call was not in order until business had intervened, and that debate was not business. That very question was decided by a former Vice President; that very question was submitted to the Senate; and the Senate held that debate was not business within the meaning of the rule. Vice President Marshall, while presiding this morning, so held and denied the request for a roll call.

I suppose the attention of the Chair was not called to the matter. I happened for the moment to be in the Marble Room, having been called there by a couple of gentlemen from my State who desired to see me, and it was during my absence that the Senator from Massachusetts made the point of no quorum, which was not in order, but he could not make the point unless the Senator from Connecticut yielded to him. He did yield, and when he yielded his right to resume the floor was at an end.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Now, Mr. President, I rise at this time not to press the point of order, but to give notice that if this thing occurs again I shall undertake to read the precedents upon that point, and will make the point of order, if the Senator yields the floor again, that he is not entitled to resume the floor.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Missouri if it would make any difference in his conclusion if he knew that the Senator from Connecticut did not know for what purpose he yielded to me? The Senator from Missouri has stated that the Senator from Connecticut yielded to me for the purpose of making the point of no quorum. He did not know but that I was going to ask him a question in connection with the matter which he was discussing. He did not yield the floor.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Massachusetts had no right to make the point of no quorum in the time of the Senator from Connecticut without his consent, unless he yielded to the Senator for that purpose; and it boots nothing to say now that the Senator from Connecticut was unaware for what purpose the Senator from Massachusetts rose. So far as the question of calling the roll is concerned, it makes no difference whether the Senator from Connecticut made the point of no quorum himself or whether some other Senator made it; it was not in order, under the ruling of the Chair.

The other point, Mr. President, to which I have referred, I do not now propose to urge. I merely mean to give notice that if the Senator yields the floor again, for any purpose, I shall undertake to make the contention that he is not entitled to resume it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri, in view of the fact that he has been giving notice for 5 or 10 minutes, whether any business has been done in the Senate in the last 5 or 10 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands, the Senator from Missouri now seeks only to admonish the Senate and does not press his point of order. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from Missouri made his point of order.

Mr. STONE. I said I rose to a question of order; but if the Senator understands that that is equivalent to making a point of order, I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Missouri has withdrawn the point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, after the dire threats with which the Senator from Missouri has filled the Chamber I should hate to do anything that would offend his sensibilities. Would it be parliamentary for me to yield courteously to the Senator from New Hampshire, or would I be then subject to being threatened with having yielded the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the point of the Senator from Missouri was as to whether the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Further than that "deponent saith not." One has to be very cautious.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. For what purpose? I desire to know; I do not yield to anybody to suggest the absence of a quorum, because I have not done so to-day; I do not want it done, and I can not yield to any Senator unless I know whether or not it would offend the Senator from Missouri; but I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire for a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not know that it is a question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, if it is not a point of order, I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not a point of order, it is not to call for a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no point of order now before the Senate; the point of order has been withdrawn.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to take cognizance, in a very frank, open way, of the threat with which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has regaled us to-day. He has told us that not only is he going to do something revolutionary in reference to the matter of calling for a quorum, but that other things are to be done.

Mr. President, some of us have not intended to speak on this bill, but the rules of this body will permit each of us to speak twice on each day, and the Senator from Missouri will not hasten the consideration or the conclusion of this bill by undertaking to intimidate Senators on this side of the Chamber, and he may as well abandon that idea one time as another. We will proceed under the rules of the Senate as we understand them, and we will take such time as we think proper under those rules to discuss these bills, and, if we are forced to do so, some of us will take time that we had not intended to take.

Mr. STONE. I have not threatened anybody.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator did threaten.

Mr. STONE. More than that, all I have said has been that I would invoke the ruling made by the Chair, which the Senator from New Hampshire approved.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well; the Senator from New Hampshire is on record, and he does not wish to change the record he made.

Mr. STONE. He is on record.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the Senator from Missouri went beyond that, and informed us that at a later time certain other procedure would be taken if we did not desist from a certain line of conduct in the Senate.

Mr. STONE. I absolutely did nothing of the kind.

Mr. GALLINGER. The RECORD shows it.

Mr. STONE. The RECORD does not show it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The RECORD does show it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. STONE. The Senator ought to state the facts; he ought not to make such a statement as that, because it is not true.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is stating what is untrue now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming will state his point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My point of order is that Senators are indulging in colloquies without addressing the Chair and without the consent of the Senator having the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I had the consent of the Senator who had the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I did not have reference to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well. I have said all I care to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am sorry that in my desire to be courteous to my fellow Senator I have precipitated such unseemly——

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is the Senator from Connecticut now making his first or his second speech on the pending question on this day?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is unable to say. The Secretary may be able to inform the Chair. The Chair thinks, however, it is a continuous speech and has taken up a good part of the day.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it worth while to have that question determined at this time, and I assume it can be determined by the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The RECORD will show that. The Chair thinks, however, we might safely leave to the honor of the Senator himself the question whether this is his first or second speech.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will be very glad to have the question answered by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should hardly dignify my poor remarks by calling them either a first or a second speech. I have proceeded with some interruptions in attempting to give my views upon different portions of this bill.

I will say, Mr. President, that I entirely disagree with the facts as stated by the Senator from Missouri. I think the true state of facts will be necessary in the determination of the point of order or the various points of order which he has suggested in his remarks. I have not yielded the floor since I obtained it. There is a great difference in parliamentary terms between a Senator yielding the floor and yielding to another Senator who asks if the Senator yields to him. When the Senator who has the floor is addressing the Senate and another Senator rises and says "Mr. President," and the Vice President says to the Senator having the floor, "Does the Senator having the floor yield to his colleague?" that is not a yielding of the floor such as to constitute a second speech when the Senator yielding resumes the floor to proceed with the discussion. I will say in passing that to those to whom I have yielded so far I have done so without the slightest notion of what they were going to do and without caring what they did or what they said. I did not know that they were going to suggest the absence of a quorum; I did not desire anybody to suggest the absence of a quorum. I am able to take care of myself, if I understand myself, and I know my rights; and when I get through talking, which will be very quickly, for I am conducting no filibuster or anything of the kind, if I am treated with ordinary senatorial courtesy and civility, I shall resume my seat in good order, I think.

I take this opportunity, however, of expressing my regret at the effect the hot weather has upon the dispositions of some of the Senators. If they are thrown into this spasm of irritability on the threshold of the consideration of the first of this interrelated series of misbranded antitrust bills, I rather hate to contemplate what will be the last stage of those persons along about the middle of September or October, when we get to the real consideration of the last emancipation proclamation.

Mr. President, as I was saying when I was interrupted the last time, everybody knows that there is no real call in the country for this Federal trade commission legislation. I do not think I err in the slightest when I say that. Most of the great newspapers of the country have been begging Congress for weeks to dry up and shut up and go home. They realize perfectly well, as well as the people of the country realize, that in this sizzling August weather, when it is hard enough to get the proper amount of sleep to be able to perform any sort of intellectual effort, Congress is fatigued and irritated and ugly and disgusted and apprehensive, and is in no frame of mind to consider this kind of legislation at all.

That is manifested here by a refusal even to read the bill. I know Senators have not read the bill, because I have talked with several of them, and it was perfectly evident that they did not know what was in it. They had no conception of it at all, and I had to pull it out and show it to them before they would believe that what I said about it was true. Having read the bill, those of them who take any sort of interest in it or realize that it is a question that their constituents have any right to demand that they should have some idea about before they gulp it down without any consideration, they are thrown into a condition of catalepsy, apparently, where they just throw up their hands and cease thinking and say, "Well, what can we do? What can we do? If we adjourn without passing all of this program which the President says he has—a legislative program, which is our business and not his—he may say that we have not supported his administration, and that will queer us in our own localities." When they are told, "Well, I should think you would take the chance of satisfying your constituents that it was unwise to pass this stuff, that part of it was not in response to the demand of your President and the other part which was inadvisable," they say, "Well, we would rather hang together than hang separately."

There is no meeting of the minds of the Senators here as to what these bills mean or as to the advisability of passing them. On the contrary, the Congress of the United States is caught here at pretty nearly the 1st of August with the demand of the country that they should adjourn and with the demand of the President that they shall not adjourn until they have gulped down an undigested mass of miserable, interfering, intermeddling, busybody, amalgamated stuff hastily concocted and ill-thought out and turn it loose upon the country; and the subserviency of Congress is such that they are apparently perfectly willing to do it.

I am not willing to do it. I do not care what the President's legislative program is. He has no business to have one. I am sick of this domineering and bulldozing, and I will not submit to it, so far as I am concerned. Other people can if they want to. I do not believe the President has any business to have a legislative program. His business, under the Constitution, is to advise Congress of the state of the Union; and he can make any recommendations he has a mind to make, respectfully, as to what he thinks personally as President ought to be done or what he thinks it would be a good thing to do.

He did it in Mexico. He had a perfect right to communicate to Congress what he would like to have Congress do in Mexico, and he sent over here a message and a joint resolution at the same time, all drawn, "O. K., W. W.," and the House passed it right off the reel, and it came over here. He said in his message that he was not doubtful about his constitutional authority to do whatever was necessary in Mexico and to enforce amends, as he said, for the insults and slights and indignities that had been heaped upon the American flag and the American uniform. He wanted authority in his resolution to use the whole military power of the United States, to order the Army and the Navy down there to enforce amends for an insult.

When the Senate presumed to inquire whether that was a proper expedition, and what the amends were to be, the advisability of passing the resolution against one Victoriano Huerta, which seemed to us to be dignifying the issue somewhat, and somewhat inconsistent with the preservation of the glory of the flag and the honor of the uniform, we were told that the President had already done what he said he was afraid to do without getting the authority of Congress, because the consequences might be so grave, referring to war. We were told that he had already done it, and Senators stood up here and said: "You must pass the resolution at once, because the lives of our boys are being taken down there. They are weltering in their blood. Therefore, pass the resolution."

Why, there was no use in passing the resolution. The President had already exercised an act of war in a foreign country with which we were at peace. He had assaulted the city of Vera Cruz, captured it, killed a lot of innocent Mexicans who stood over on the hills, who were not participating in the fracas, but were killed by our shells, and some of our people were killed in this marauding expedition to enforce amends.

For six weeks or two months 40 great battleships flying the American flag, with steam up, have been wallowing in the trough of the sea down off the coast of Vera Cruz, with the thermometer 120 in the shade, and the Army Corps has dug a ditch for itself around Vera Cruz and our soldiers are standing there in the mud—those of them that are not in the hospitals—sweltering under the tropical sun, directed by Congress to enforce amends for the insults that have been heaped upon our flag and uniform.

What are they doing there? Why are they not in Canada? Are they enforcing any amends? Why, as soon as that pretext had become a little shopworn we were told that we were never engaged in a war of revenge, but we were really there in a war of service—service to the Mexicans—the message having stated to us that we never would be authorized to participate in the internal affairs of any foreign country with which we were at peace. Well, what service are we performing to them now? It looks to the people of the country as though all we were doing was meddling in a foreign country and holding the throat of one dictator or bandit while another dictator or bandit rushed to occupy his place.

I am not criticizing the President for having his views about his business, but I do say that a President who will dragoon Congress into doing what the country is not demanding, what the business interests of the country are not demanding, but who holds us here because he is able to prevent his party from adjourning when it wants to adjourn, to pass something that the public prints said this morning he had expected, when he announced his wishes to Congress, would have been concluded by the middle of July, but which he now thinks can not be done until the middle of September, is exceeding his constitutional prerogatives or else the Congress are abandoning theirs—one of the two.

Mr. President, the spasm into which some of my friends in this Chamber have been thrown by the fact that I insist on reading to the Senate the bill that we are supposed to be debating is entirely unjustified, it seems to me, unless we are to be compelled to pass these bills without reading them. All of the Senators have not read this bill, and I think the country is entitled to know what is in it. A bill comes out here, reported out of a committee, and when it is laid before the Senate somebody moves that the first formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for committee amendments. Then proceeds a jumble of amendments, page after page of fine print, and then individual amendments, and never a copy of the bill is printed in the RECORD so that the people at home can take the proposed amendment and fit it into the bill and see what you are talking about. I thought it was not exceeding the senatorial proprieties or decencies or common sense to read the bill into the RECORD, so that the people may see it as a consecutive, coherent bill, and then compare it with the jumble of amendments that are offered to it afterwards. When it comes up, if it is necessary, by the offering of amendments to the other bills, that the Clayton bill shall be again read into the RECORD, if under the modified rules which may be in force at that time in the Senate guaranteeing the freedom of debate, I may be permitted to do it without being taken to task and called to order and an attempt being made to remove me from the floor, I shall have the audacity to do it; and I shall hope Senators will be able to retain their self-possession at least fully as well as they have on my first attempt.

That is all I have to say about this bill at this time; but in the future I shall have several remarks to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let the amendment be stated, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at end of section 5, the following proviso:

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if we are going to vote upon it, I think the Senator having the bill in charge should be present in the Chamber, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, under the ruling of the Chair the Senator can not do that.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; I can.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No business has been transacted since it has been ruled that the absence of a quorum could not be suggested.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, Mr. President; the amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Nelson	Simmons
Brady	Hollis	Newlands	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Hughes	Norris	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Kenyon	O'Gorman	Smoot
Camden	Kern	Overman	Stone
Catron	Lane	Owen	Swanson
Chamberlain	Lea, Tenn.	Page	Thomas
Clapp	Lee, Md.	Perkins	Thornton
Clark, Wyo.	Lewis	Pittman	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	Martin, Va.	Reed	Vardaman
Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Shafroth	Walsh
Gallinger	Myers	Sheppard	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia answered to his name when called.

Mr. BANKHEAD and Mr. SHIELDS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of section 5, the following:

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12579) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 23, and agrees to the same with an amendment, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate; further insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 37, 81, 139, and 155; agrees to the further conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. BURKE of South Dakota managers at the conference on the part of the House.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON SOCIAL INSURANCE (H. DOC. NO. 1132).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of the provision of law contained in the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, that "Hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law," I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress and for its determination whether it will authorize the acceptance of the invitation a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, being an invitation from the Government of the French Republic to that of the United States to send delegates to the International Conference on Social Insurance, to be held at Paris in September, 1914, and a letter from the Department of Labor showing the favor with which that department views the proposed gathering.

It will be observed that the acceptance of this invitation involves no special appropriation of money by the Government.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 27, 1914.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the pending bill, I think, may be mildly described as revolutionary in character. The fact, however, standing alone, that the bill may be revolutionary in character is no reason why it should not be passed if it be a wise and necessary measure.

An examination of the bill will demonstrate that the power which has been conferred or attempted to be conferred upon this trade commission is simply immeasurable in extent. I am aware of the fact that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] takes a cheerful, optimistic view of the matter and insists that in all probability the power which is conferred will not be exercised. Mr. President, we ought not to confer a power which is unwise upon the mere faith that it will not be exercised by the people upon whom it is conferred.

This trade commission, if it is created, will be given jurisdiction in one form and another over anywhere from 300,000 to 500,000 corporations, because it is given jurisdiction over all corporations which may be engaged in or—as I shall show later on by a provision of the act, whatever it may mean—"affecting" interstate commerce. Of course, nearly every trading corporation, manufacturing corporation, and business corporation in the country is to a greater or less extent engaged in interstate commerce. If a corporation in the course of a year should transact a single item of business in interstate commerce it would seem that it would be brought within the operation of this proposed law.

If this interstate trade commission shall exercise its powers to the full the expense which will be laid upon the Government of the United States can not be measured in dollars and cents. It will amount to a sum so large as to be appalling. To exercise this control and jurisdiction over all these corporations will entail the employment of a perfect army of agents. It was estimated during the hearings that it would require upon a very conservative estimate some thousands of employees, and the expense would run up into many millions of dollars.

The powers conferred upon this trade commission are very broad and far-reaching. The commission is to be constituted a sort of general residuary legatee of all interstate-commerce activities which are not now under the control of some other body. Rather it is constituted a general smelling society of all the acts of the corporations of the United States which may be engaged in interstate commerce that are not under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is to be, in addition to that, a general publicity bureau. It is to go smelling about the country, finding out the domestic affairs of the various corporations, and it is not restricted by the bill to finding out simply matters which concern interstate commerce. It may investigate its books; it may ascertain its business secrets; it may ascertain every act that it is engaged in performing, whether it has relation to interstate commerce or not, upon the hypothesis that in some remote way it may relate to interstate commerce. Then it is to be constituted a publicity bureau in its discretion to publish broadcast throughout the land all or so many of these facts as it may choose to publish.

In addition to that, it is to be constituted a sort of father confessor to the business men of the country who may be required under another provision of this extraordinary bill to make a report annually upon such matters and in such form as the commission may require. Not content with conferring upon the commission these multiform activities, it is also to be constituted a master in chancery to which certain cases may be referred by the court.

In addition to that, it is to be a general assistant, an all-around assistant, to everybody in the investigation and prosecution of corporations which may be engaged in interstate commerce, to advise the Attorney General when he shall act, to find out whether the orders and decrees of the courts are being carried out, and if not, to call attention to the fact and see that proceedings are taken to the end that they may be properly carried out. So it will be seen that the sponsors for this bill have put upon the interstate trade commission a pretty ambitious program of duties.

Now, Mr. President, all of that would not be sufficient to prevent our adopting a bill if it be expedient and wise, but it is necessary that we should go further and show that there are really specific objections to the powers which have been attempted to be conferred, and that in a very brief way I shall attempt to do.

I may say in the beginning that I have no intention of discussing this bill for the mere sake of occupying time. I am going to discuss it because I believe it to be a dangerous measure, and in many respects an unjust measure, and a measure which we ought not to pass.

Having stated to the Senate my views upon the matter I am content, of course, that it shall be voted upon at as early a date as the business of the Senate will permit.

I first of all call attention to section 3, which is the first of the substantive sections of the bill. The introductory clause of section 3 provides that—

The commission shall have power, among others—

Subdivision (a) of the section reads:

(a) To investigate from time to time, and as often as the commission may deem advisable, the organization, business, financial condition, conduct, practices, and management of any corporation engaged in commerce and its relation to other corporations and to individuals, associations, and partnerships.

Now, let me analyze and dissect that for a moment. It is to be given power not only in its discretion, without any general legislative standard or rule to control its action, but wholly in its own unrestricted discretion, as often as it may deem advisable, to investigate, of course in any way it pleases, not only the organization, business, and financial condition of a corporation engaged in interstate commerce but also its conduct and practices. There is no limitation upon the character of the conduct and practices which it may investigate. The conduct and practices may relate to interstate commerce, they may relate to intrastate commerce, or they may relate to neither.

In addition to that, it is given the power to investigate the relation of the corporation which is itself engaged in interstate commerce with any other corporation and with individual associations and partnerships. Again, whether those relations have any sort of connection with interstate commerce or not. In other words, it is given a roving commission to investigate all the affairs of all the corporations of the country which may be engaged in interstate commerce; and that is the sole and only test of its jurisdiction, namely, to inquire whether or not a particular corporation is engaged in interstate commerce; and if it is, then the power is given to investigate all of its multiform and multifold activities, whether they relate to interstate commerce or not.

Now, I undertake to say, Mr. President, that that is a power which Congress can not devolve upon a commission; it is a power which Congress can not itself exercise; and, after all, that is the primary test of the power which we may devolve upon a commission—whether the Congress itself may exercise the power. If it can not, it is a power which can not be devolved upon a legislative commission. We have by this provision undertaken to give to this commission a general power of visitation over all that class of State corporations which may be engaged in interstate commerce. That is a power which does not belong to the Federal Government, but is a power which belongs only to the sovereignty which creates the corporation, namely, the State. If this is not an attempt to confer visitorial powers upon this commission, then I must confess that I have no conception as to what that term means.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield, if the Senator from Ohio desires to ask me a question.

Mr. POMERENE. I merely wish to ask a question. If I understand the Senator from Utah correctly, he objects to inquisitorial powers being conferred upon the commission as being unconstitutional in part?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. My question is, Wherein are the powers conferred upon this commission in that behalf different from those now enjoyed by the Bureau of Corporations?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, Mr. President, that will not settle the difficulty. I think the powers conferred upon the Bureau of Corporations are entirely beyond the authority of Congress. The truth about it is—I have not made a very careful comparison, but so far as my general reading goes—the powers conferred upon this commission are pretty much the same as those which we have heretofore attempted to confer upon the Bureau of Corporations; but, as the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] replied to me the other day when I put the question to him, the Bureau of Corporations has never undertaken to exercise its powers in any compulsory way. Of course, unless some case shall come up that can go to the courts, there is no way of determining whether or not the act creating the Bureau of Corporations and conferring power upon that organization is valid. So long as the Bureau of Corporations simply proceeds without antagonizing anybody, there is no opportunity of testing its powers; but I would make exactly the same criticism of the powers conferred upon the Bureau of Corporations that I make of the powers conferred upon the proposed trade commission.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator from Utah that the only instance in which the Bureau of Corporations attempted to investigate a corporation was in the case of the Beef Trust. The result of that whole examination was to give them immunity. Judge Carpenter decided that because they had been called to give testimony about the operations of the Beef Trust therefore they were entitled to immunity.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). To whom does the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I merely wish to offer an amendment to the pending bill and to have it printed. The amendment is, on pages 20 and 21, to strike out section 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will yield now to the Senator from Ohio if he desires to interrogate me, but not for a controversy between himself and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. POMERENE. My question was going to address itself rather to the Senator from Minnesota, but I will not now ask to interrupt the Senator from Utah for that purpose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will ask the Senator from Ohio not to do so at this time.

Mr. President, I lay down the proposition that Congress has no more authority to regulate a corporation organized under the laws of a State because the corporation is engaged in interstate commerce than it has to regulate an individual who lives in a State because he happens to be engaged in interstate commerce. I know that there is a vague, popular notion that Congress has some greater authority over a corporation than it has over an individual, but I undertake to say that nothing in any of the law books can be found which will justify such a notion. Congress has precisely the same power—no more and no less—to regulate a corporation engaged in interstate commerce than it has to regulate a partnership, an association, or an individual who may be engaged in interstate commerce.

If this bill had been aimed at individuals, I venture to say that there are many of its provisions that would not have met with the assent of a good many Members of the Senate who will probably vote for the bill in its present form.

Upon that question, because it is stated so very succinctly, I desire to call attention to a statement or two made by Mr. Thomas C. Spelling, a very eminent legal author, a man very thoroughly familiar with this subject. The first statement that I call attention to is in a recent publication of his entitled "Political deceptions and delusions," in which he has taken up some of these proposed measures for discussion. He says:

The Federal Government can not regulate anything when not being used in interstate commerce, nor any person or corporation merely because engaging in interstate commerce. In requiring, for instance, that all trains carrying interstate freight or passengers shall be equipped with air brakes and safety couplers, Congress is not as a specific object regulating these devices nor even the trains, nor yet the corporate carriers. True, the statutes provide for the prosecution and punishment as for a misdemeanor the carriers who do not comply with the law, but that is the vindicatory part of the act. The subject matter of the regulation is the transportation—the interstate commerce. No more are they, the corporations, thereby regulated than are liquor dealers when required to take out a license by a State law.

In that case, I may interpolate, the thing which the State regulates is the business; and its jurisdiction over the business of selling liquor does not give it the right to regulate the person who engages in the selling of liquor. In the same way our power to regulate an interstate transaction does not give us any right to regulate the persons who may be engaged in interstate-commerce transactions. The writer proceeds:

Such a law is the regulation of the liquor traffic; and every person who goes into that business thereafter must, as a condition precedent, obtain a license, whether such a person be white or black, native or foreign born, engaged in the liquor business or in some other occupation. Safety appliances, carriers, and corporations are necessarily mentioned in interstate-commerce regulations just as are shippers of all classes and the articles shipped.

Now, I call particular attention to this:

But the mere fact that railroad companies are constantly carrying merchandise and passengers and are therefore continuously under the immediate operation of the laws does not give the Federal Government any control over them as corporations or their property, nor any over the private affairs of a shipper, except such of his affairs as are involved in the transportation of his property in interstate commerce.

Again, at page 261, he says:

Therefore any act of Congress which is not a regulation—that is to say, a regulation of that commerce which is interstate—is not a regulation at all, but an interference with private affairs, which are either constitutionally protected by express language or exclusively under State control by implication, and therefore exempt.

And on the succeeding page he says:

Commerce, in any such sense as to call for congressional regulation, can not come into existence without an exercise of the will power of man, nor does any such thing exist in the absence of action and movement of men or of agencies set in motion by them. For purposes of congressional regulation the sphere of interstate commerce without transportation or transmission, either actual or contemplated, may be compared to a vacuum. There is no actual or operative interstate commerce until transportation has begun.

And he cites a number of decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in support of that proposition.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not rise to ask a question so much as to make a suggestion. I hope the Senator from Utah, before he has finished, will show how the workman's compensation bill, of which he was more the author than any other person, the constitutionality of which is not seriously doubted, is brought within the principles he has just been reading from Mr. Spelling. I do that because I am sure that when he shows that the regulation contemplated in that bill is made to conform to these principles or is sustained by these principles, he will at the same time show how the regulation proposed in this bill is brought within them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, Mr. President, the answer, to my own mind, is a very simple one. That bill was constitutional upon exactly the same ground that the employers' liability law was constitutional.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree to that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. By the employers' liability law we undertook to say that railroad corporations engaged in interstate commerce shall be liable to their employees injured while such employees are also engaged in interstate commerce; they must both at the time of the injury be engaged in an interstate-commerce transaction; and the theory upon which both those laws can be supported is that by compelling the employer to be responsible, either under the enlarged common-law provisions of the employers' liability law or under the liability of the compensation laws the effect is to add to the safety and to the facility of interstate business. For example—and there are other illustrations, and they are all given in the report which I had the honor of presenting to the Senate upon the subject—for example, the employee while engaged in dangerous work is certain that if he be injured his family is not going to suffer unduly, but that they are going to receive compensation, and the theory of that is, or, at least, one of the theories is, that that will contribute to his peace of mind and will enable him to discharge his duties with greater facility than he otherwise would be able to do, and that in that way, and in other ways which I could illustrate if I were inclined to take the time, it contributes to the safety of the movement of things in interstate transportation. The Supreme Court held, however, in the first employers' liability case that the law then passed was unconstitutional because it undertook to impose a liability upon the carrier for an injury to an employee on the sole ground that the employer was engaged in interstate business, and they said that that would make the employer liable not only when an injury occurred to an employee when he was also engaged in interstate business but when an employee was engaged in intrastate commerce as well; and the court said one was within the power of Congress and the other was entirely without the power of Congress. So that the illustration to which the Senator from Iowa directs my attention, to my own mind, presents a very strong illustration against the position assumed by this bill and not in its favor. For example, I said, and I repeat, that the power of Congress is the same over corporations as it is over individuals. Have we any power to regulate the intrastate activities of a person who is a passenger or is about to become a passenger in interstate traffic simply because he is that sort of a passenger? When he is moving from one State to another we have a right within limits to regulate his activities, in so far as they have relation to his movements from one State to another, but the fact that he is a person traveling from one State to another or transporting his goods from one State to another does not give us any authority to interfere with him in any other activities. The power, therefore, is to regulate commerce and not the persons who may simply be engaged in commerce.

The difficulty with the subdivision (a), to which I have called attention, is that it confuses and unites in this one section the power on the part of the trade commission to regulate the activities of corporations engaged in interstate commerce without limiting the power to those activities which relate to interstate commerce. Of course, it gives them the power to investigate those things which relate to interstate commerce, but it does more; it gives them, in addition, the other power, and by combining the two the Supreme Court, if it follows the decision in the employers' liability case and in many other cases, the early trade-mark cases, and others, will, it seems to me, undoubtedly hold that this provision is utterly unconstitutional.

The trade commission are to be given the authority to investigate the conduct and practices of corporations engaged in interstate commerce, their relations with other corporations, and their relations with individuals, associations, and partnerships; in fact, any sort of relation, as I have said, whether they have any reference to interstate commerce or, indeed, whether they have any reference to commerce at all. I call attention upon both propositions to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Adair v. United States (208 U. S., 161). That was a case where Congress had undertaken to provide, among other things, that it should be an offense to discriminate against an employee on the ground that he was a member of a labor union. The Supreme Court held that that was utterly unconstitutional; that because we had the right to regulate the interstate activities of a corporation of that kind it gave us no right to regulate the employment of men who were to be engaged in both kinds of business, and that that was entirely outside of our power.

Mr. NEWLANDS. What case was that?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The case of Adair against United States, Two hundred and eighth United States, page 161. I also direct attention to one of the trade-mark cases in One hundredth United States, at page 82, and to the employers' liability case, Two hundred and seventh United States, at page 463, and from that case I think I will read a brief extract:

Now, the rule which the statute establishes for the purpose of determining whether all the subjects to which it relates are to be controlled by its provisions is that anyone who conducts such business be a "common carrier engaged in trade or commerce in the District of Columbia, or in any Territory of the United States, or between the several States"—

And so forth. Now, listen:

That is, the subjects stated all come within the statute when the individual or corporation is a common carrier who engages in trade or commerce between the States, etc. From this it follows that the statute deals with all the concerns of the individuals or corporations to which it relates if they engage as common carriers in trade or commerce as between the States, etc., and does not confine itself to the interstate-commerce business which may be done by such persons.

In other words, the statute was in such broad terms that it included the activities of the employee in interstate commerce and intrastate commerce as well.

The court says:

Stated in another form, the statute is addressed to the individuals or corporations who are engaged in interstate commerce and is not confined solely—

Now, I emphasize that word—is not confined solely to regulating the interstate-commerce business which such persons may do—that is, it regulates the persons because they engage in interstate commerce and does not alone regulate the business of interstate commerce.

As it seems to me, that is one vice of this provision—that it does not relate alone to interstate business, but relates to the corporation engaged in interstate business, and gives the commission power to investigate all its activities, its conduct, its practices, its relations to other corporations and individuals, whether those activities themselves have any relation to interstate commerce or not.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I be permitted to ask the able Senator a question, the answer to which would interest me as a lawyer?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the argument he is now making was made, with no more ability but with equal fullness, before the Supreme Court of the United States in what are known as the corporation-tax cases, where the argument was presented that the corporations which were taxed were corporations of the State of Illinois—and, as the Senator remembers, others intervened—having no interstate relation whatever, many of them being only corporations within the State, having their charters from the State, doing their business wholly within the State. The Supreme Court of the United States, considering the case in One hundredth United States, referred to by the able Senator, and the other cases cited, reached this conclusion, which is not at all in accord with my fundamental ideas of government, but it is the law for us—that wherever the subject matter connected with, or apparently connected with, or reasonably could connect with interstate affairs in the general discharge of the duties, that was sufficient. It was not essential that it should absolutely connect with such affairs or that it should be absolutely interstate. It was enough that the subject matter was of a kind that could operate in connection with interstate commerce.

Does the able Senator recall those decisions?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I do not. I have not in mind the decision to which the Senator refers. He said these were tax cases.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; they were tax cases, brought under the corporation-tax law passed by Congress.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The taxing power has no such limitations as to the power to regulate commerce. There are other limitations so far as the taxing power is concerned, but the fact that a corporation is engaged only in State business does not prevent its being taxed by the Federal Government. The matter must be tested by some other consideration than that.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator does not think that would turn on the question of whether or not the corporation was engaged in interstate commerce?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, not at all. We have imposed a corporation tax upon all corporations falling within certain terms. I have forgotten the exact language.

Mr. LEWIS. That is the law to which I am now alluding.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is no doubt about the validity of such a law, because it is under the taxing power; and we are not limited to interstate corporations in exercising the taxing power.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the question referred to by the Senator from Illinois just now has been before the courts, though not in a taxing case, but in a case involving the Sherman antitrust law. I call his attention to the Knight case, the Sugar Trust case——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; I remember that case very well.

Mr. SHIELDS. In which just the contrary of that which is suggested by the Senator from Illinois was held.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. And also the copper company cases—the Calumet and Hecla cases, I believe—in the United States Circuit Court for the Sixth Circuit, the opinion being delivered by Mr. Justice Lurton, where there were interlocking directorates and interchanging stockholders. In those cases it was attempted to hold the alleged combinations void under the Sherman law, on the possibility that they might engage in interstate trade, but the court held that they did not violate that law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; the court in the Knight case very clearly distinguished between the power to regulate intrastate matters and interstate matters.

In the Knight case, as I recall, it was held that, although it was made perfectly apparent that there was a conspiracy and a combination to monopolize the manufacture of sugar within certain States, so long as they did not go beyond the manufacture, that was wholly an intrastate matter; that it was only when the manufactured article was set in motion from one State to another that the power of Congress attached.

Mr. SHIELDS. The point I desired to call attention to was that the mere possibility that the business of the corporation might become interstate will not bring it within the Sherman law or under the jurisdiction of any law passed by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire, if I may be pardoned, to call the attention of both Senators to the fact that the Knight case has been practically distinguished out of existence, so far as concerns being at variance with the views expressed by me. I must insist that the Supreme Court of the United States has done this in the Westinghouse case, where the exact question was raised, where the electrical appliances were charged to be the direct product of a single State, and likewise in the two greater cases known as the Tobacco and the Standard Oil Co. cases. My inclination is to assume that the Knight case is practically distinguished in such a way that it can no longer be regarded as authority.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think myself that the Knight case was improperly decided, but I do not quarrel with the rule of law which the court laid down. I think, if I read the record correctly, that in that case there was shown a monopolization of interstate commerce, or an attempt to monopolize interstate commerce. So far as the decision of the court is concerned, however—that it is not within the power of Congress to deal with manufacture in a State because ultimately the manufactured article may enter into the channels of interstate trade—I think the decision is perfectly sound.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is that position which, I think, constitutes the entire ruling in the Knight case.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It does.

Mr. CUMMINS. If it is sound, practically every decision rendered by the Supreme Court since that time is unsound. The Supreme Court held in the Knight case that a manufacturer in Pennsylvania, having monopolized the refining of sugar, was not within the antitrust law because that sugar, when refined, would pass into channels of interstate trade; that it did not violate the antitrust law, because the transportation of the sugar was not so directly connected with the monopolization of its manufacture as to bring it within the law. I understand that the Knight case has not only been distinguished, but that for 15 years and more the Supreme Court has utterly refused to apply its doctrine to the cases it has had under consideration.

Really, however, I did not rise to say that. I rose to express my assent to a part of the argument which the Senator from Utah is making. I think the power that we confer upon the commission must relate to or affect interstate commerce. I agree that it is not and can not be a regulation of the individual or of the corporation as distinguished from the interstate business which the individual or the corporation is carrying on. I did not want anyone to assume because I am for the bill that I dissent from that very sound and obviously well-established doctrine.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator from Iowa——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I will not yield for any such purpose. If the Senator desires to ask me anything I will yield, but I will not yield for a colloquy between the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I will ask the Senator from Utah a question. Assuming that his position is correct, that the investigation must be with reference to the subject matter of interstate commerce and not simply with reference to a person, natural or artificial, I will ask the Senator whether it is not a fact that this investigation may extend to matters relating to purely State commerce, where the matters of interstate and of State commerce are so mingled as to make it impossible to separate the one from the other, and whether the Supreme Court has not practically decided that question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not care whether the Supreme Court has decided it or not. I am very glad the Senator has asked me that question, because it enables me to state a distinction which otherwise I might have overlooked.

I answer the Senator's question, categorically, "Yes." The fact that in the investigation of interstate activities it is necessary to disclose intrastate matters, that intrastate matters are inextricably interwoven with the interstate matters, will not prevent the commission from investigating; but that is a very different thing from conferring upon the commission in terms the power to investigate both matters or to investigate all conduct of interstate corporations simply because they are engaged in interstate commerce.

I do not know whether I make myself clear or not, but I will put it in a little different form.

If we have the power to create the commission and the power to authorize it to investigate at all, we have the power to authorize it to investigate the conduct and the practices and the relations of interstate corporations in so far as those activities and relations may themselves relate to interstate commerce. Now, that is our legislative power; but in carrying the law into operation the commission itself may incidentally go outside of that power, because it is impossible to investigate the one without to some extent investigating the other. As I say, however, that is a very different thing from conferring such authority in terms of legislation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah will notice that in paragraph (b) there is such a limitation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was coming to paragraph (b) in another connection later along. I am simply criticizing this bill as it reads. I have no doubt that some amendments will be made to it hereafter that may improve it, although I do not believe it can be improved sufficiently to warrant me in voting for it.

I call attention, in that connection, to section 4, which reads:

> The powers and jurisdiction herein conferred upon the commission shall extend over all trade associations, corporate combinations, and corporations as hereinbefore defined engaged in—> engaged in or affecting commerce, except banks and common carriers.

Now, notice—

Just what is meant by that I must leave those who prepared the bill to explain; but, as though the language of subdivision (a) of section 3 were not sufficiently broad to read it out of the authority of Congress, section 4 has been added which gives it jurisdiction over all corporations and combinations and trade associations, not only upon the ground that they are engaged in interstate commerce, but on the ground that they "affect" interstate commerce. Since they use both expressions—"engaged in" and "affecting"—they must have intended that those two expressions are to have different or cumulative meanings. If the corporations are engaged in interstate commerce, they fall within the jurisdiction of the commission; or, not being engaged in interstate commerce, if they are affecting interstate commerce, still they fall within the jurisdiction of the commission.

I suppose some corporation might be doing a business which would affect interstate commerce, although itself never doing a single transaction in interstate commerce. Some person who manufactures a particular article and sells his entire output to a wholly independent trading company in the same State would be affecting interstate commerce, although he would not be engaged in interstate commerce; but under the terms of this bill even such a manufacturer is to fall within the terms of the law and be subject to the power of the commission.

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield, and to whom?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield first to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Utah will remember that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that exact thing—that any act of a State authority that is inseparably connected with or affects interstate commerce is within the jurisdiction of the United States under the power to regulate commerce.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That would be a very different thing from the case I am supposing. The legislation of a State which affects interstate commerce affects a subject that is within the jurisdiction of Congress. Here, however, is jurisdiction given to a commission to deal with a corporation which is itself not engaged in interstate commerce, will never be engaged in interstate commerce, will never have a single, solitary transaction in interstate commerce, if it is doing anything which affects interstate commerce, however indirectly and however remotely.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; but the Senator from Utah will remember that the antitrust law is founded on that very proposition—that any person who restrains trade or commerce—it makes no difference whether he is engaged in commerce or not—if he restrains commerce—that is, affects it in that way—he falls within the jurisdiction of the Federal authority, and it is within our power to prevent the restraint in the way of a regulation of commerce.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Iowa will see the distinction between an act in restraint of interstate commerce and an act which merely affects interstate commerce, however remotely. It may affect it beneficially. It may affect it in the sense that the subsequent transactions in interstate commerce could not be had unless the article were manufactured. It affects it in that way, but take, for example, a policy of insurance issued by a State insurance company. It may affect interstate commerce, yet the Supreme Court has held repeatedly that the company issuing the insurance policy, or the policy itself, was not within the jurisdiction of Congress merely because it affects commerce.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not have in mind the exact phraseology of the statute or of the decision of the Supreme Court, but it seems to me that we can get some light by analogy, at least, from the safety device decision of the Supreme Court rendered about a year ago. In that case it was held that in cars which were used wholly in intrastate commerce, if they were connected with a train that had cars on it which were used in interstate commerce, it was so affecting interstate commerce as to permit the Federal Government to have jurisdiction.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I have not attempted to say, and I would not argue, that because the activities of a company or an individual affected interstate commerce that took it out of the power of Congress to deal with. I am saying that simply because it does affect commerce that does not of itself give Congress jurisdiction.

Mr. POMERENE. I said as a general proposition.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But it does not give it, necessarily. A farmer is engaged in raising wheat in North Dakota. He raises an immense quantity of wheat. That affects ultimately interstate commerce, ultimately it will go into interstate commerce; but nobody would pretend that Congress has any jurisdiction over that farmer. Yet, if this language is to be literally construed, it will give us jurisdiction over a corporation of farmers, at any rate, if there be such a thing.

The next subdivision of section 3 of the bill is subdivision (b), and that reads as follows:

(b) To require any corporation subject to the provisions of this act which the commission may designate to furnish to the commission from time to time information, statements, and records concerning its organization, business, financial condition, conduct, practices, management, and relation to other corporations, or to individuals, associations, or partnerships, and to require the production for examination of all books, documents, correspondence, contracts, memoranda, or other papers relating to or in any way affecting the commerce in which such corporation under inquiry is engaged—

I stop at that point to say that the Senator from Iowa called my attention to the fact that in this subdivision, the limitation of which I complained was not to be found in subdivision (a), is to be found here, and I have read it down to that point. The provision is, "or in any way affecting commerce in which such corporation under inquiry is engaged," but it goes on—or concerning its relations to any individual, association, or partnership, and to make copies of the same.

So far as its relations to any individual or association or partnership is concerned, they need not have the remotest relation to interstate commerce, yet the commission are given the power to investigate. This power is broadly conferred. There is not any paper or any number of papers of any corporations that this commission in the exercise of its arbitrary power desires to have before it for inspection that it can not compel to be brought. It has the power to go into the private affairs of every corporation, into its most detailed business affairs, and examine them.

Mr. President, my complaint about that is that it is in utter violation of the fourth amendment to the Constitution against unlawful searches and seizures. Let me read the provision of the Constitution. It will be found in the Manual at page 223:

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, and houses—

Now, listen—not only in their persons and houses, but in their—papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

I call attention to a decision in the Thirty-second Federal Reporter in the matter of the Pacific Railway Commission. In that case Congress had undertaken to create a commission and had created a commission for the purpose of investigating the Central Pacific Railway Co., and perhaps others. They undertook to make the investigation and require the production of certain papers of that company. Mr. Justice Field in discussing their power referred to the case of Boyd against United States, in One hundred and sixteenth United States, page 616. That, by the way, is the leading case upon the subject of unlawful searches and seizures. The justice said:

In the recent case of Boyd v. United States (116 U. S., 616; 6 Sup. Ct. Rep., 524) the Supreme Court held that a provision of a law of Congress which authorized a court of the United States in revenue cases, on motion of the Government attorney, to require the defendant or claimant to produce in court his private books, invoices, and papers, or that the allegations of the attorney respecting them should be taken as confessed, was unconstitutional and void as applied to suits for penalties or to establish a forfeiture of the party's goods. The court, speaking by Mr. Justice Bradley, said:

"Any compulsory discovery extorting the party's oath or compelling the production of his private books and papers to convict him of crime or to forfeit his property is contrary to the principles of a free government. It is abhorrent to the instincts of an Englishman; it is abhorrent to the instincts of an American. It may suit the purpose of despotic power, but it can not abide the pure atmosphere of political liberty and personal freedom."

That is the end of the quotation from Mr. Justice Bradley. Then Mr. Justice Field proceeds:

The language thus used had reference, it is true, to the compulsory production of papers as a foundation for criminal proceedings; but it is applicable to any such production of the private books and papers of a party otherwise than in the course of judicial proceedings or a direct suit for that purpose. It is the forcible intrusion into and compulsory exposure of one's private affairs and papers without judicial process, or in the course of judicial proceedings, which is contrary to the principles of a free government and is abhorrent to the instincts of Englishmen and Americans.

Then he quotes that famous language of Lord Camden, from an early English case, in Nineteenth Howard State Trials, where it is said:

Papers are the owner's goods and chattels; they are his dearest property, and are so far from enduring a seizure that they will hardly bear an inspection; and though the eye can not, by the laws of England, be guilty of trespass, yet where papers are removed and carried away the secret nature of those goods will be an aggravation of the trespass and demand more considerable damages in that respect. Where is the written law that gives any magistrate such a power? I can safely answer there is none; and therefore it is too much for us, without such authority, to pronounce a practice legal which would be subversive of all the comforts of society.

Then, after that quotation, Mr. Justice Field proceeds:

Compulsory process to produce such papers, not in a judicial proceeding, but before a commission of inquiry, is as subversive of "all the comforts of society" as their seizure under the general warrant condemned in that case. The principles laid down in the opinion of Lord Camden, said the Supreme Court of the United States, "affect the very essence of constitutional liberty and security. They reach further than the concrete form of the case then before the court with its adventitious circumstances; they apply to all invasions on the part of the Government, and its employees, of the sanctity of man's home and the privacies of life."

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Utah give me that citation, please?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Thirty-second Federal Reporter, page 251.

Mr. LEWIS. May I say to the able Senator that the decision referred to by Lord Camden, which was the case of Entick against Carrington, Nineteenth Howard State Trials, received more thorough consideration in the case of Weeks against United States, which came up to the Supreme Court of the United States only lately. The case is possibly familiar to the able Senator, and if not, I will be very glad, if he is not overburdened with labor, to place it before him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have read the case, and I have it on my desk here, in Two hundred and thirty-second United States.

This rule applies to corporations as well as to individuals. That was expressly decided by the Supreme Court in a very recent case—the case of Hale against Henkel—where the court said, in Two hundred and first United States, page 75:

Although, for the reasons above stated, we are of the opinion that an officer of a corporation which is charged with a violation of a statute of the State of its creation, or of an act of Congress passed in the exercise of its constitutional powers, can not refuse to produce the books and papers of such corporation, we do not wish to be understood as holding that a corporation is not entitled to immunity, under the fourth amendment, against unreasonable searches and seizures. A corporation is, after all, but an association of individuals under an assumed name and with a distinct legal entity. In organizing itself as a collective body it waives no constitutional immunities appropriate to such body. Its property can not be taken without compensation. It can only be proceeded against by due process of law, and is protected, under the fourteenth amendment, against unlawful discrimination. Gulf, etc., Railroad Co. v. Ellis (165 U. S., 150, 154) and cases cited. Corporations are a necessary feature of modern business activity, and their aggregated capital has become the source of nearly all great enterprises.

It has been established, I think, beyond any question that, while the fifth amendment, with reference to compelling incriminating testimony, does not apply to a corporation, the fourth amendment, against unlawful searches and seizures, does, and a corporation, so far as its books and papers are concerned, has exactly the same immunity in that respect that an individual has.

Mr. WHITE. I would be glad if the Senator would give me the last citation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Two hundred and first United States, page 75.

While I have this volume before me I wish to call attention to one or two other cases. First, I will call attention to the case to which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] just referred, Two hundred and thirty-second United States, page 391, in which they quote from Mr. Justice Bradley:

The principles laid down in this opinion—

Referring to the decision of Lord Camden—affect the very essence of constitutional liberty and security. They reach further than the concrete form of the case then before the court, with its adventitious circumstances; they apply to all invasions on the part of the Government and its employees of the sanctity of a man's home and the privacies of life. It is not the breaking of his doors and the rummaging of his drawers that constitutes the essence of the offense, but it is the invasion of his indefeasible right of personal security, personal liberty, and private property, where that right has never been forfeited by his conviction of some public offense; it is the invasion of this sacred right which underlies and constitutes the essence of Lord Camden's judgment.

I will not stop to read at any length from the Weeks case, but it is a very instructive case, and is the last expression of the Supreme Court with reference to this subject.

The author that I have already referred to, Mr. Spelling, at page 303 of this book, also calls attention to this doctrine. After referring to some of the decisions of the Supreme Court, he says:

But clearly the power must be exercised with a definite purpose in view, a purpose to accomplish a result within the court's jurisdiction.

That is, it must be, as I understand it, to accomplish some specific thing. If a case is pending, then the court may require the production of papers relating to that case. The papers must be specified, however. The documents must be specified at least generally. It is not sufficient to send out a subpœna in general terms directing the party to bring in all his private papers. That was expressly condemned in the case of Hale against Henkel, to which I called attention.

I again call attention to the language of the Supreme Court in Two hundred and first United States, at page 71. The court says:

We held—

Referring to the Boyd case—

That a compulsory production of a man's private papers to establish a criminal charge against him, or to forfeit his property, is within the scope of the fourth amendment to the Constitution in all cases in which a search and seizure would be, and that the order in question was an unreasonable search and seizure within that amendment.

That is, the requirement to produce the papers, even the issuance of a subpœna, may be within the meaning of the fourth amendment of unreasonable search and seizure.

Further on:

We are also of opinion that an order for the production of books and papers may constitute an unreasonable search and seizure within the fourth amendment. While a search ordinarily implies a quest by an officer of the law, and a seizure contemplates a forcible dispossession of the owner, still, as was held in the Boyd case, the substance of the offense is the compulsory production of private papers—

Let me repeat that for the sake of emphasis—the substance of the offense is the compulsory production of private papers, whether under a search warrant or a subpœna duces tecum, against which the person, be he individual or corporation, is entitled to protection. Applying the test of reasonableness to the present case, we think the subpœna duces tecum is far too sweeping in its terms to be regarded as reasonable. It does not require the production of a single contract, or of contracts with a particular corporation, or a limited number of documents, but all understandings, contracts, or correspondence between the MacAndrews & Forbes Co. and no less than six different companies, as well as all reports made and accounts rendered by such companies from the date of the organization of the MacAndrews & Forbes Co., as well as all letters received by that company since its organization from more than a dozen different companies, situated in seven different States in the Union.

That was condemned by the Supreme Court in that case. What would they say about language which does not even confine it to transactions between a number of different companies, but which authorize this commission to require any corporation "to furnish to the commission from time to time information, statements, and records concerning its organization, business, financial condition, conduct, practices, management, and relation to other corporations, or to individuals, associations, or partnerships, and to require the production for examination of all books, documents, correspondence, contracts, memoranda, or other papers relating to or in any way affecting the commerce in which such corporation under inquiry is engaged," and, moreover, require it to produce papers and documents which concern "its relations to any individual, association, or partnership, and to make copies of the same."

Under that they could issue an order to a corporation or to any number of corporations to bring before them all their books, all their papers, and every written thing which they may have.

Mr. STERLING. What case is that?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is Two hundred and first United States, Hale against Henkel. The court proceeds:

If the writ had required the production of all the books, papers, and documents found in the office of the MacAndrews & Forbes Co., it would scarcely be more universal in its operation or more completely put a stop to the business of that company. Indeed, it is difficult to say how its business could be carried on after it had been denuded of this mass of material, which is not shown to be necessary in the prosecution of this case and is clearly in violation of the general principle of law with regard to the particularity—

"With regard to the particularity"— required in the description of documents necessary to a search warrant or subpœna. Doubtless many, if not all, of these documents may ultimately be required, but some necessity should be shown, either from an examination of the witnesses orally, or from the known transactions of these companies with the other companies implicated, or some evidence of their materiality produced, to justify an order for the production of such a mass of papers. A general subpœna of this description is equally indefensible as a search warrant would be if couched in similar terms.

Further on, in the dissenting opinion—although not on this point—of Mr. Justice Brewer and the Chief Justice, at page 86, they say:

Neither does the fact that a corporation is engaged in interstate commerce in any manner abridge the protection and applicable immunities accorded by the amendments.

The corporation of which the petitioner was an officer was chartered by a State, and over it the General Government has no more control than over an individual citizen of that State. Its power to regulate commerce does not carry with it a right to dispense with the fourth and fifth amendments, to unreasonably search or seize papers of an individual or corporation engaged in such commerce, or deprive him or it of any immunity or protection secured by either amendment.

It is true that there is a power of supervision and inspection of the inside workings of a corporation, but that belongs to the creator of the corporation. If a State has chartered it, the power is lodged in the State. If the Nation, then the Nation, and it can not be exercised by any other authority. It is the nature of the power of visitation.

From page 88 I quote this further statement:

The fact that a State corporation may engage in business which is within the general regulating power of the National Government does not give to Congress any right of visitation or any power to dispense with the immunities and protection of the fourth and fifth amendments. The National Government has jurisdiction over crimes committed within its special territorial limits. Can it dispense in such cases with these immunities and protections? No more can it do so in respect to the acts and conduct of individuals coming within its regulating power. It has the same control over commerce with foreign nations as over that between the States.

Now, I call attention also to a general statement contained in a memorandum which was prepared with great care by Mr. Carman F. Randolph, a very eminent lawyer. Everybody who knows him knows that his opinion upon a question of this kind is entitled to great weight. I call attention to one or two of his expressions. On page 9 of this brief or memorandum, he first quotes from another part of the case of Hale against Henkel, from which I have been reading, in which it is stated—this is a quotation from the Supreme Court—

But such franchises, so far as they involve questions of interstate commerce, must also be exercised in subordination to the power of Congress to regulate such commerce, and in respect to this the General Government may also assert a sovereign authority to ascertain whether such franchises have been exercised in a lawful manner, with a due regard to its laws. Being subject to this dual sovereignty, the General Government possesses the same right to see that its own laws are respected as the State would have with respect to the special franchises vested in it by the laws of the State. The powers of the General Government in this particular in the vindication of its own laws are the same as if the corporation had been created by an act of Congress. It is not intended to intimate, however, that it has a general visitorial power over State corporations.

Then, referring to another case, that of Harriman against the Interstate Commerce Commission, which I have here, this quotation is made from pages 417 to 421, Two hundred and eleventh United States Reports:

The legislation that the commission may recommend embraces, according to the arguments before us, anything and everything that may be conceived to be within the power of Congress to regulate, if it relates to commerce with foreign nations or among the several States.

I may pause here in reading to say that this was an attempt on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission to compel the attendance of witnesses and to make an investigation without a specific case being before it, but with a view, among other things, of making a report to Congress to enable Congress to help to pass additional legislation. The court proceeds:

And the result of the arguments is that whatever might influence the mind of the commission in its recommendations is a subject upon which it may summon witnesses before it and require them to disclose any facts, no matter how private, no matter what their tendency to disgrace the person whose attendance has been compelled. If we qualify the statement and say only legitimately influence the mind of the commission in the opinion of the court called in aid, still it will be seen that the power, if it exists, is unparalleled in its vague extent.

How far Congress could legislate on the subject matter of the questions put to the witnesses was one of the subjects of discussion, but we pass it by. Whether Congress itself has the unlimited power claimed by the commission we also leave on one side. It was intimated that there was a limit in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson (154 U. S., 447, 448, 479). Whether it could delegate the power, if it possesses it, we also leave untouched, beyond remarking that so unqualified a delegation would present the constitutional difficulty in most acute form.

I call especial attention to this:

The power to require testimony is limited, as it usually is in English-speaking countries, at least to the only cases where the sacrifice of privacy is necessary—those where the investigations concern a specific breach of the law.

The court goes on then and holds that the act does not authorize any such proceeding, and the intimation is very clear that it would not be warranted by the Constitution.

Mr. KENYON. From what case is the Senator from Utah reading?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. From Harriman v. The Interstate Commerce Commission (211 U. S. R.).

Mr. STERLING. What page?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It begins on page 407. The court adds:

We could not believe on the strength of other than explicit and unmistakable words that such autocratic power was given for any less specific object of inquiry than a breach of existing law, in which, and in which alone, as we have said, there is any need that personal matters should be revealed.

I said I was going to quote from Mr. Randolph, and I have thus far quoted from quotations made by him; but this is his conclusion:

The conclusions of the opinion are strengthened by the later decisions cited. Hale v. Henkel, while maintaining a proper Federal right to see that State corporations respect the Federal law, disclaims any general Federal visitorial power over them and affirms to them the protection of the fourth amendment. And all the decisions follow the best tradition of our jurisprudence in condemning the dragnet and the short-cut quest, even—

Mark the word "even"— even when a breach of the law is in question.

Of course, much more so if no breach of the law is in question; but we are simply investigating for some unknown purpose. Then he concludes:

If such rough and roving quests are forbidden, even when they are incident to a regular proceeding, for vindication of the law, how can they be permitted to a purely administrative body in a mere search for information, whether it be undertaken in problematic aid of legislation or on rumor or suspicion of wrongdoing?

And yet this commission, for almost any conceivable purpose, is given the power to compel the production of all the papers and of all the books and of all the documents of any corporation, and to investigate its relations with individuals and corporations, whether or not those relations relate to interstate commerce.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just a moment. And it may do that with a view of recommending legislation to Congress; it may do it with a view of exercising its power as a publicity bureau to acquaint the public with what they have found out or for any conceivable reason which may appeal to them. Now I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have before me the interstate-commerce act which gives to the Interstate Commerce Commission a like power—to compel the production of books and orders. Does the Senator involve the Interstate Commerce Commission in the condemnation directed against this bill, or does he discriminate in some manner?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The decisions which I read from the Supreme Court were with reference to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And they held, or they intimated, at any rate, that if any such power was conferred it was beyond the power of Congress.

Mr. WALSH. That is to say, the statute received such a construction as gave it a restricted effect within constitutional limits.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They call attention to the different provisions of the statute which very clearly show that.

Mr. WALSH. So that those decisions clearly mark out the line in which the trade commission may operate under this bill, do they not? I understand the argument of the Senator, however, to be to the effect that the provision would have no force or effect at all because of the constitutional objections which he urges.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator evidently has not been here while I have been discussing the matter.

Mr. WALSH. I have been trying to follow the argument of the Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I undertook to point out why I thought it was invalid, and I made a general statement in the beginning as to why I thought so. I am now taking up these sections seriatim.

Mr. WALSH. I am speaking of the section the Senator is now canvassing, and I was simply curious to know whether the Senator involved the provision in the interstate-commerce act in the same condemnation or whether he discriminated between the two or whether he took the position that a different construction would have to be given to this act?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think that this bill goes entirely beyond the provisions of the interstate-commerce law.

Mr. WALSH. I have that act before me here.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And I am now criticizing it in that view.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, I will be very glad to read the provisions of the interstate-commerce act.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope the Senator will not do that, because I should like to get through with what I have to say, and I have read the provisions of that act.

This bill gives the trade commission the power to compel the production of all papers, and, I repeat, it gives them the power to compel the production of papers whether or not they relate to interstate commerce or whatever they relate to. That power, it seems to me, can not be justified under any view of constitutional guaranties.

The next subdivision that I shall call attention to very briefly is subdivision (c) of section 3, as follows:

(c) To prescribe as near as may be a uniform system of annual reports from such corporations or classes of corporations subject to the provisions of this act as the commission may designate, and to fix the time for the filing of such reports, and to require such reports, or any special report, to be made under oath, or otherwise, in the discretion of the commission.

It seems to me that that is a power which at least admits of very oppressive use. No rule, no standard, is laid down; there is no provision by which the commission may be restricted to any specific thing, but it is given the power to prescribe such uniform system of annual reports as they may designate; to fix the time for the filing of the reports; and to require such reports to be made under oath, or otherwise, in their discretion. I think there must be a standard in a matter of that kind as well as in the conferring of other substantive powers upon a commission. No such standard is provided here. Upon that general subject I call attention to the same writer, Mr. Randolph, who says:

The rule against delegating legislative power to administrative bodies has come to be more liberally construed under the tremendous pressure of the functions assumed by the modern State, but the principle and the range of their jurisdiction—whether of persons or of matters—should, if not fully mapped out by the legislature, be indicated sufficiently to preclude a loose right of selection. For if an act of the body be not rooted in jurisdiction duly conferred by the law-making authority it is without warrant—and this is equally true of classification for jurisdictional purposes.

I call attention in that connection to section 6:

SEC. 6. That if any corporation subject to this act shall fail to file any annual or special report, as provided in subdivision (b) of section 3 hereof, within the time fixed by the commission for filing the same, and such failure shall continue for 30 days after notice of such default, the corporation shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every day of the continuance of such failure—

And so forth.

That is a pretty drastic provision. A corporation can be required to furnish reports about all its business affairs, whether they relate to interstate commerce or something else, with the utmost detail; and if it fail to comply it is to be subject to this penalty.

Section 9 has a general bearing upon this and other sections. That section provides:

SEC. 9. The district courts of the United States, upon the application of the commission alleging a failure by any corporation, or by any of its officers or employees, or by any witness, to comply with any order of the commission for the furnishing of information, shall have jurisdiction to issue such writs, orders, or other process as may be necessary to enforce any order of the commission and to punish the disobedience thereof.

It occurs to me that that is rather a remarkable power to vest in a court. The commission is given the power to enforce any order that this administrative body may choose to make. I can not conceive how that can be a judicial power. If Congress makes an order, certainly Congress can not go to a court to enforce its order; if a committee of Congress makes an order, certainly it can not go to any court to enforce its order; and I do not think that Congress could pass a law which would authorize it to go to a court to enforce its order. I am aware of the fact that there is a comparatively recent decision in the Supreme Court which held, by a divided court, that a certain order for the production of testimony might be enforced by the court, and I shall have occasion in a moment or two to call attention to that case; but, first of all, I call attention to general statements made upon this subject in the case to which I have already referred in the Thirty-second Federal Reporter, at page 241. I call attention to that because that case grew out of the fact that the Congress had appointed the Pacific Railway Commission, which was authorized to investigate the affairs of the Pacific Railway companies, and directed that its orders might be enforced by application to the court. In the course of that decision it was stated:

The judicial power of the United States is therefore vested in the courts and can only be exercised by them in the cases and controversies enumerated and in petitions for writs of habeas corpus. In no other proceedings can that power be invoked, and it is not competent for Congress to require its exercise in any other way. Any act providing for such exercise would be a direct invasion of the rights reserved to the States or to the people, and it would be the duty of the court to declare it null and void. Story says in his Commentaries on the Constitution that "the functions of the judges of the courts of the United States are strictly and exclusively judicial. They can not therefore be called upon to advise the President in any executive measures or to give extrajudicial interpretations of law or to act as commissioners in cases of pensions or other like proceedings.

Then he goes on and quotes from some other authorities. Later on, at page 258, Mr. Justice Field says:

The provision of the act authorizing the courts to aid in the investigation in the manner indicated must therefore be adjudged void. The Federal courts under the Constitution can not be made the aids to any investigation by a commission or a committee into the affairs of anyone. If rights are to be protected or wrongs redressed by any investigation, it must be conducted by regular proceedings in the courts of justice in cases authorized by the Constitution.

Again, on page 259, he says:

It is enough that the Federal courts can not be made the instruments to aid the commissioners in their investigations. It also renders it unnecessary to make any comment upon the extraordinary position taken by them according to the statement of the respondent, to which we have referred, that they did not regard themselves bound in their examination by the ordinary rules of evidence, but would receive hearsay and ex parte statements, surmises, and information of every character that might be called to their attention. It can not be that the courts of the United States can be used in furtherance of investigations in which all rules of evidence may be thus disregarded.

In a concurring opinion by Mr. Circuit Judge Sawyer he says—and I call particular attention to this, not only in connection with this matter, but in connection with the other powers conferred upon the trade commission—

A general, roving, offensive, inquisitorial, compulsory investigation, conducted by a commission without any allegations, upon no fixed principles, and governed by no rules of law, or of evidence, and no restrictions except its own will, or caprice, is unknown to our Constitution and laws; and such an inquisition would be destructive of the rights of the citizen and an intolerable tyranny. Let the power once be established and there is no knowing where the practice under it would end.

The whole case is a very instructive one upon the general subject.

In the Brimson case, in One hundred and fifty-fourth United States, the Supreme Court held that the powers conferred by the interstate-commerce act, with reference to compelling the attendance of witnesses, could be enforced. That was a decision by five judges. Three judges—Chief Justice Fuller, Mr. Justice Brewer, and Mr. Justice Jackson—dissented. Mr. Justice Field, who undoubtedly would have agreed with them if he had been present, was not present at the argument, so that it may be regarded as a "five to four" decision. Nevertheless, it is the law; but I call attention to that case for the purpose of suggesting that the case should not be extended beyond what is decided. At least one circuit court refused to follow it in a case arising under the pension laws. I read, however, from page 478:

We do not overlook these constitutional limitations which, for the protection of personal rights, must necessarily attend all investigations conducted under the authority of Congress. Neither branch of the legislative department, still less any merely administrative body, established by Congress possesses or can be invested with a general power of making inquiry into the private affairs of the citizens. (Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S., 168, 190.) We said in Boyd v. United States (116 U. S., 616, 630)—and it can not be too often repeated—that the principles that embody the essence of constitutional liberty and security forbid all invasion on the part of the Government and its employees of the sanctity of a man's home and the privacies of his life. As said by Mr. Justice Field in In re Pacific Railway Commission (32 Fed. Rep., 241, 250;—

I call attention to that particularly, because that is the case from which I have just read. Quoting from Mr. Justice Field:

Of all the rights of the citizen few are of greater importance or more essential to his peace and happiness than the right of personal security, and that involves not merely protection of his person from assault, but exemption of his private affairs, books, and papers from the inspection and scrutiny of others. Without the enjoyment of this right all others would lose half their value.

One of the cases to which I have referred as having declined to follow that decision under other circumstances is found in Eighty-first Federal Reporter at page 847. I shall not stop to read it; it is rather lengthy.

I will, however, read this single extract from it:

Mr. Justice Harlan, in the opinion in the Brimson case, considers the constitutional objections that were made in the cases just cited to these statutes, invoking the aid of the courts for the production of testimony, and sustains the procedure directed by the interstate-commerce acts just referred to, upon the distinct ground that the commission was required, as the Supreme Court interprets the acts, by a petition to the circuit court, to distinctly set forth the particular questions to be answered, and the certain books and papers mentioned and named, and that it was then open to each witness to contend before that court that he was protected by the Constitution from making answer to the questions propounded to him, or that he was not legally bound to produce the books, papers, etc., ordered to be produced.

But here the attempt is made to invest the court with the general and sweeping power to enforce all of the orders with reference to furnishing information, no matter what the information may relate to, and without reference to its having application to some specific inquiry.

The next subdivision is subdivision (d). That is the provision which gives the commission power—

To make public, in the discretion of the commission, any information obtained by it in the exercise of the powers, authority, and duties conferred upon it by this act, except so far as may be necessary to protect trade processes, names of customers, and such other matters as the commission may deem not to be of public importance—

Not as Congress may deem proper, not as Congress may limit by some definite rule or standard, but as the commission, in its unrestricted discretion, may deem not to be of public importance—and to make annual and special reports to the Congress and to submit therewith recommendations for additional legislation.

So this commission, in addition to prying into all the affairs of these various corporations, in its discretion, is given the power to publish broadcast the information it obtains, with certain specific limitations. I can not myself see what that general power had to do with interstate commerce—to publish these things to gratify somebody's curiosity as to what is going on. What has that to do with interstate commerce?

Mr. Spelling, referring to another phase of this bill or a similar bill, makes a remark which will apply to that when he says:

What has the manner in which books are kept to do with interstate commerce? If this is not merely an attempt to evade the Constitution, why not just have Congress declare this duty as a regulation and impose a penalty for noncompliance? We should then see how long it could stand against an attack in the courts.

I now call attention to the language of the Supreme Court in One hundred and eighteenth United States, page 370. I think it is pretty good doctrine to consider in connection with all of these powers that are attempted to be conferred. The court says:

When we consider the nature and the theory of our institutions of government, the principles upon which they are supposed to rest, and review the history of their development, we are constrained to conclude that they do not mean to leave room for the play and action of purely personal and arbitrary power.

What is it but arbitrary power that we have conferred upon this commission?

Sovereignty itself is, of course, not subject to law, for it is the author and source of law; but in our system sovereign powers are delegated to the agencies of government, sovereignty itself remains with the people, by whom and for whom all government exists and acts. And the law is the definition and limitation of power. It is, indeed, quite true that there must always be lodged somewhere and in some person or body the authority of final decision, and in many cases of mere administration the responsibility is purely political, no appeal lying except to the ultimate tribunal of the public judgment, exercised either in the pressure of opinion or by means of the suffrage. But the fundamental rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, considered as individual possessions, are secured by those maxims of constitutional law which are the monuments showing the victorious progress of the race in securing to men the blessings of civilization under the reign of just and equal laws, so that, in the famous language of the Massachusetts bill of rights, the government of the Commonwealth "may be a government of laws and not of men," for the very idea that one man may be compelled to hold his life, or the means of living, or any material right essential to the enjoyment of life, at the mere will of another, seems to be intolerable in any country where freedom prevails as being the essence of slavery itself.

Here is a bill which confers upon a commission almost unrestricted power without any rule or standard being laid down according to which it must be exerted, to do whatever they may deem they ought to do, whatever they may think they care to do in the way of prying into the affairs, the books, and papers of any and every corporation in the country.

I also insert an extract from the case of Fisher Co. v. Woods (187 N. Y., 90). I read from page 94:

The legislature may not, under the guise of protecting the public interest, arbitrarily interfere with private business or impose unusual or unnecessary restrictions upon lawful occupations. The legislative determination as to what is a proper exercise of the police power is subject to the supervision of the court and in determining the validity of an act it is its duty to consider not only what has been done under the law in a particular instance but what may be done under and by virtue of its authority.

That is a complete answer to the statement of the Senator from Nevada that these extraordinary powers may not be exercised by the commission. He is trusting them not to exercise to the full the powers which we have conferred upon them. The test of the validity of the law is, however, What are the powers we have conferred?—not What powers are likely to be exercised by the commission upon whom they are conferred?

The court proceeds:

Liberty in its broad sense means the right not only of freedom from servitude, imprisonment, or restraint, but the right of one to use his faculties in all lawful ways, to live and work where he will, to earn his livelihood in any lawful calling, and to pursue any lawful trade or avocation.

The next clause is that contained in the section lettered "(e)." That clause attempts to confer upon the commission the powers of a master in chancery. It provides:

In any suit in equity brought by or under the direction of the Attorney General as provided in the antitrust acts, if the court finds for the complainant it may, upon its own motion or the motion of any party to such suit, refer the matter of the form of the decree to be entered to the commission as a master in chancery; whereupon the commission shall proceed in that capacity upon such notice to the parties and upon such hearing as the court may prescribe, and shall as speedily as practicable make report with its findings to the court, which report and findings having been made and filed shall be subject to the judicial procedure established for the consideration and disposition of a master's report and findings in equity cases.

I make this proposition preliminarily, and I think it can not be disputed: The appointment of a master in chancery is a judicial function. No legislature can appoint an assistant to a court. That is purely a judicial power. The Supreme Court of Wisconsin, and I think one or two other courts, went so far as to hold that even an assistant in the court room—not an assistant to the court in the discharge of its official duties, but an assistant in the court room—could not be appointed by the legislature or by an executive; that that power belonged to the courts. So, clearly, if this bill had attempted to make the appointment and to make it binding upon the court, it would have been utterly void, because it is clearly an attempt to exercise the judicial power of appointing as an assistant to the court a master in chancery, a power which belongs only to the court itself.

It may be said, however, and will be said, that the effect of this is simply to point out this commission as a body to whom a court may refer these matters as a master in chancery.

I make this suggestion about it, however, that if the appointment of a master in chancery be the exercise of judicial power, and be a function outside of the legislative power, then any litigant in the courts has a right to insist that the court shall exercise its judicial power. In other words, it does not lie with the court alone to say that it shall permit the legislative body to appoint its assistants. The litigants have something to say about it; and when one of these litigants concerned in the transactions that may be the subject of judicial investigation comes into the court, he will have a right to say that every function of the court must be performed by the court itself; that the court is not only not obliged to accept the appointee of the legislative body as a master in chancery, but that it can not accept the appointee of the legislature; that it must make the appointment itself.

I make that statement with some hesitation, although I believe there is force in the suggestion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. This paragraph of the section simply qualifies or renders competent the commission to receive an appointment by the courts. It does not appoint nor impose any restraint whatever upon the courts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have said that, substantially.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator, in the latter part of his remarks, seemed to imply that there was something here in the nature of an appointment. I desire to suggest this to him: The court has the inherent power to appoint an administrator; that is a judicial function; but does the Senator doubt the power of a legislature to make a corporation competent to act as an administrator?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, no.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the legislature can make a corporation competent to act as an administrator, why can it not make the commission competent to act as a master in chancery?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think the appointment of an administrator is necessarily the exercise of judicial power. In fact, the legislature might provide, and does provide, that certain persons shall not act as administrator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not any doubt that the legislature could disqualify certain persons from acting as master in chancery.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In making a will the testator appoints an executor and the court is bound to execute the will.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am speaking not of the executor, but the administrator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The administrator does not assist the court in deciding cases in performing its judicial functions. The administrator is a business agent who handles the estate and makes his report to the court. At any rate, I make the suggestion that I think there is very great doubt about it.

One of the leading cases upon this general subject is that of the State ex rel. Hovey v. Noble (118 Ind., p. 350). There was an attempt on the part of the legislature to appoint a commission to assist the court in hearing and deciding cases. The legislature provided, however, that the court was not to be bound by its findings. It was to review, and then the court could make such decision as it pleased. In the course of the decision the court said, at page 159, Tenth American State Reports:

The people have a right to the courts established by and under the constitution, and this constitutional right the legislature can neither alter nor abridge. Constitutional tribunals can not be changed by legislation, and the supreme court is a constitutional court. It can be composed of judges only; for only judges can constitute a court. No part of the judicial duties of that court can be assigned to any other person than one of the duly chosen judges. The legislature has no power to change its organization, nor can that body, under the guise of creating commissioners, divide the duties of the judges, nor authorize it to be done.

I repeat that. It can not divide the duties of the judges nor authorize it to be done.

Mr. CUMMINS. On the question of the right of a court to appoint a master in chancery who was not a judge, how and where does the court secure that right?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It acquires it as a court that exercises judicial power.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the extract the Senator was just reading says that the court can not receive aid from anybody but a judge in discharging its judicial functions.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; it does not say that. The legislature has no power to change the organization of the court, nor can the legislature, under the guise of creating a commission, divide the duties of the judges nor authorize it to be done.

This authorizes the duties of the judges to be done by dividing the duties of the judges between the judges and the commissioners appointed according to the act of the legislature.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will agree to that perfectly; but, inasmuch as it is a function of the court to appoint an aid in the form of a master in chancery, and that being undoubtedly true, I see no possible escape from the conclusion that the legislature may render a person or a corporation competent to receive the appointment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think this does more than that. It does more than to render him eligible. The court proceeds:

Under our Constitution as amended the legislature may establish courts, but it can not destroy the constitutional courts—the circuit courts and the Supreme Court—nor can it change their organization nor redistribute their powers, for these courts owe their organization to the Constitution, and as the Constitution has ordained that they shall be organized, so they shall be.

* * * * * * *

It is clear to us that there is, and can be, no such offices as the legislature has assumed to create, and that the act is in all its parts utterly void.

There are some other statements in the case that I shall desire to insert in the RECORD. I will not stop to read them now.

Since the time of Queen Elizabeth, courts have appointed masters in chancery, and masters in chancery and master commissioners now are, and have always been, appointed by the Federal courts. Our own law has from the earliest years of the State recognized, as it does still, the right of the judiciary to select masters in chancery and master commissioners.

* * * * * * *

Proceeding still further upon the concession which we have provisionally made—and made simply for argument's sake—we affirm that the power to appoint the "ministers and assistants" of the judges is a judicial power, and was a judicial power when the Constitution was adopted. We assert, as a conclusion necessarily following from the proposition we have affirmed, that when the framers of the Constitution declared that the judicial power was vested in the courts, they invested this power in the judiciary as it then existed, and that this investment conferred upon the courts the exclusive power to choose their own ministers and assistants. We suppose no one will deny that the courts, from the earliest ages of the law, have possessed the power to appoint referees, receivers, commissioners, and all other like ministers or assistants, and that they possessed this power because it was a judicial power. If it was not a judicial power, it could not have resided in the courts, for courts have no other power.

* * * * * * *

Those who are chosen by the people to sit as judges must themselves discharge all the judicial duties of their offices. The trust is imposed upon them, and they can not share their judicial duties with any person. The people have a right to the judgment of those whom they have made judges, and this right the judges can not surrender, if they would, without a flagrant breach of a sworn duty. The trust is a personal one, inalienably invested in the persons selected by the people, and it can not be delegated by the judges themselves, nor by any one else for them.

The next section I desire to call attention to is section 7, which provides that—

Any person who shall willfully destroy, alter, mutilate, or remove out of the jurisdiction of the United States or authorize, assist in, or be privy to the willful destruction, alteration, mutilation, or removal out of the jurisdiction of the United States of any book, letter, paper, or document containing an entry or memorandum relating to commerce, the production of which the commission may require under this act, or who shall willfully make any false entry relating to commerce in any book of accounts or record of any trade association, corporate combination, or corporation, subject to the provisions of this act, or who shall willfully make or furnish to said commission or to its agent any false statement, return, or record, knowing the same to be false in any material particular, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Now, what does that do? It provides that it shall be a criminal offense, punishable by imprisonment or a fine, or both, if any person shall willfully destroy any book, letter, paper, and so forth, not "fraudulently," but "willfully." That simply means that if he has a paper and tears it, knowing that he is tearing it, it is willfully done. If the most innocent individual imaginable shall destroy, alter, or remove out of the jurisdiction of the United States, or shall assist in or be privy to such a thing, he is guilty of this offense. There is no limit of time. The only test whether the paper can be thus willfully destroyed or removed is that it shall be a paper or memorandum which the commission may—nobody knows when, but at some time in the vast-extending future—require the production of. For all time, according to the language of this section, all these corporations must preserve all their papers and all their documents, if there be anything in them which relates to an interstate-commerce transaction, and therefore being a paper which the commission may sometime require.

Of all the extraordinary provisions of this bill, to my mind that is the most extraordinary. The idea is that a corporation must go on accumulating year after year and year after year a vast body of useless documents that have served their purpose and are no longer of use to anybody and that they must still, under this penalty of the law of imprisonment, continue to pile them up because perhaps sometime this commission may require their production.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the final question that I desire to discuss, and that is section 5 of this bill. It has been often read here and often commented upon. It provides "That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful," and the commission is "empowered and directed to prevent corporations from using unfair methods of competition in commerce."

I presume by that that the commission may be authorized to prevent something which is not declared unlawful by this act, because the thing which is declared to be unlawful is unfair competition, and the thing which the commission is authorized and required to prevent is unfair "methods" of competition. I do not know whether it is the view of the framers of this bill that unfair competition and unfair methods of competition mean the same thing, but I do know that the words "unfair competition" have a very well settled meaning in the law and that the words "unfair methods of competition" have not. So if we accept that provision as to unfair methods of competition it seems to me very clearly that we have authorized the commission to legislate without laying down any primary standard.

What are unfair methods of competition? Can anybody tell me? Can anybody make a comprehensive list of the acts which will constitute unfair methods of competition? Of course we can frame a definition of what is unfair competition under the authorities. "Unfair competition," as I have said, has a very well settled meaning. It means simply and only, as I understand it, an attempt upon the part of one person or of a corporation to impose his or its goods or business upon the public as the goods or business of another. A violation of a trademark is an illustration of unfair competition. The element of fraud must exist. The courts have repeatedly held that if fraud does not exist it was not unfair competition. It is the palming off of something which you are attempting to sell to the public as being a product of somebody else. Here is Apollinaris water, which is a well-known brand of mineral water. If I should discover some other mineral water, whether it was as good as that or not, and should prepare a yellow label of the same color as the Apollinaris label and misspell the word, spelling it with one l instead of two l's, and put it out on the market and pretend, and give people reason to believe, that I was selling Apollinaris water as they understood Apollinaris water, that would be unfair competition.

Now, then, those things are perfectly well understood. They are within the control of the courts to-day. There is not a single instance of unfair competition that the courts are not fully competent to deal with.

What does this bill undertake to say with reference to the powers of the commission in that respect? It provides that—

Whenever the commission shall have reason to believe that any corporation has been or is using any unfair method of competition—

Not unfair competition but unfair methods; then it may issue a written order to the corporation which it suspects and compel that corporation to appear before it and show cause why it should not be restrained. I suppose that implies that there will be a hearing, and after the hearing if it finds that the unfair methods exist it shall issue an order restraining and prohibiting the use of the same.

But that is not all. Whenever the commission after the issuance of this order finds that the corporation is not complying with it, it may petition the district court within any district where the methods were in use praying the court to issue an injunction to enforce such order of the commission. Then follows this simple and comprehensive injunction of duty upon the part of the court:

And the court is hereby authorized to issue such injunction.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the Senator's attention to this language in lines 8, 9, and 10, on page 21:

And if upon such hearing the commission shall find that the method of competition in question is prohibited by this act.

Now, what method of competition is prohibited by the act? Can the Senator or anyone else tell? It does not say that the commission shall find that it is unfair competition, but if they find that the method used is unfair——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Nobody knows what that is.

Mr. NELSON. That method is prohibited by this act. There is no guide, no criterion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not a thing. If it means, as I argued the other day about it, what the prohibitory part of the section says, namely, unfair competition, then in view of the power that is conferred upon the commission, and the apparent provision of the bill, that the court shall simply enforce its orders, it would seem to me to be very clear that it is an attempt to confer judicial power.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Suppose the commission should find that corporation A uses an unfair method in competition by selling its goods cheaper than its competitor across the street, what then? Is that a case that would be obnoxious to the law?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not know.

Mr. NELSON. Does anybody know?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I am afraid not.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to know if the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] would know in such a case.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; I know.

Mr. NELSON. If he would undersell his goods?

Mr. CUMMINS. It would not be unfair competition.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Would it be an unfair method of competition?

Mr. CUMMINS. It would not. Is there any further inquiry to be made?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope the commission will be as certain about these matters as the Senator from Iowa is.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, no sane, sensible man ever suggested that mere underselling constitutes unfair competition.

Mr. NELSON. Can the Senator give us an illustration of what would be an unfair method of competition?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; many. I was just reading one here from the very well-known case of the Mogul Steamship Co. against MacGregor, which is illustrative of the common law of England. I want to discuss it some day when my friend from Rhode Island is here.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is a long case, and I hope the Senator will let me finish.

Mr. CUMMINS. I had just reached that part of it in which one of the judges had recited what he regarded as an act of unfair competition.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, it seems that under this proposed bill when the commission determines that unfair competition or unfair methods of competition exist it issues an order which, in form, is an injunction, a thing which only a court can issue; and if that is not obeyed by the corporation enjoined, application is made to the court, and that court, so far as this bill is concerned, in a perfectly perfunctory manner itself issues a real injunction. There is no provision for citing the parties, taking testimony, trying the original case de novo; but if the order of the commission has not been complied with, the court is authorized to issue an injunction, and that is all there is to it.

Now, let me read a few decisions with reference to what is judicial power. It seems to me that that is judicial power, and if it is, the attempt to confer it upon a legislative commission is utterly void. In Fletcher v. Peck (6 Cranch, 87), the court says:

> It is the peculiar province of the legislature to prescribe general rules for the government of society; the application of those rules to individuals in society would seem to be the duty of other departments.

Now, then, the legislature, in compliance with that rule, as stated by the Supreme Court, has prescribed the general rule, which is that unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful. Having prescribed that general rule, the court says the application of that rule to individuals in society would seem to be the duty of another department, not the duty of the legislative department; and if it is not within the power of the legislative department, it can not be conferred upon one of these commissions.

And again, Tiffany on the Constitution, in section 117, says:

> Congress can enact any constitutional law and make it binding upon the people individually. But it has no authority to interpret, construe, or apply the law enacted. It can not judicially determine that there has been an infraction of the law by one upon whom it was obligatory. That power can only be exercised by the judiciary.

In Prentis v. Atlantic Coast Line (211 U. S., 226) it is said:

> The judicial inquiry investigates, declares, and enforces liabilities as they stand on present or past facts and under laws supposed already to exist. That is its purpose and end. Legislation, on the other hand, looks to the future and changes existing conditions by making a new rule to be applied thereafter to all or some part of those subject to its power. The establishment of a rate is the making of a rule for the future and, therefore, is an act legislative, not judicial, in kind.

When we created the Interstate Commerce Commission we laid down the primary standard that rates should be just and reasonable; that they should not be discriminatory. That was the general boundary which the legislative body erected, and it devolved upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to do what? Not to decide cases, but to make laws within these primary boundaries, laws which should comply with the primary standard which Congress laid down. When the Interstate Commerce Commission makes a rate, in effect it enacts a law. That has been so declared by the Supreme Court. It is a rule for the future. What do you find of that character in this provision:

> Unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful.

The trade commission, if it acts under that clause, is not making a rule or a law within this primary standard, but it is declaring when it acts that somebody has violated the law, and it is proceeding to render judgment that the violator shall be restrained and enjoined from the continuance of those acts which constitute a violation of the law.

In the Interstate Commerce Commission v. Railway Co. (167 U. S., p. 499) it is said:

> It is one thing to inquire whether the rates which have been charged and collected are reasonable—that is a judicial act; but an entirely different thing to prescribe rates which shall be charged in the future—that is a legislative act.

Here the transaction is completed when it is brought to them. They inquire whether or not the conduct of a given corporation squares with the declaration of Congress; whether it is a violation of the declaration that unfair competition is unlawful. Then it proceeds to render judgment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Utah yield just a moment further?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope the Senator will be brief.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know that I am trespassing upon the Senator's good nature, but the case that he just read from was, of course, decided prior to the act of 1906. Until then the Interstate Commerce Commission had the right to decide whether a particular rate was reasonable or unreasonable.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope the Senator, if he is going to answer the argument, will do it in his own time. I am anxious to get through, and do not want to prolong the discussion any more than I can help.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was going to ask a question. In 1906 we conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to prescribe what should be the rate in the future; and I want to ask the Senator whether the function exercised before that time by the commission of declaring a given rate unreasonable was not precisely what he is now saying that no commission can do?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not saying what the commission can do. I am reading what the court said about it. The court says, in an opinion rendered by Mr. Justice Brewer, who was an able lawyer:

> It is one thing to inquire whether the rates which have been charged and collected are reasonable—that is a judicial act; but an entirely different thing to prescribe rates which shall be charged in the future—that is a legislative act.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is quite true; but that is just what the commission did from 1887 until 1906.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The commission did not inquire as to whether or not past rates were reasonable and impose a penalty if they were unreasonable. They did not undertake to do that. They thereafter prescribed a rule for the future.

Mr. CUMMINS. They did not impose a penalty, but they ascertained whether the rate charged was reasonable or unreasonable, and then made an award——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Made a law for the future.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; made an award in favor of the shipper who had been overcharged.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, of course, the Senator can refine about it, but it seems to me it is a play upon words rather than dealing with the substance of the thing.

Mr. CUMMINS. That was not judicial power.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have simply read what the court said; and I am not aware that the Supreme Court has ever departed from it. In ex parte Fairbanks (194 Fed. Rep., 994) it is said:

> That which defines a judicial from a legislative act is that the one is the determination of what the existing law is in relation to some existing thing already done or happened, while the other is a predetermination of what the law shall be for the regulation of all future cases falling within its provisions. To adjudicate upon and protect the rights and interests of individual citizens and to that end to construe and apply the laws is the peculiar province of the judicial department.

In Merrill v. Shurburne (1 N. H., 199, 203) the court says:

> On general principles, therefore, those inquiries, deliberations, orders, and decrees which are peculiar to such a department must in their nature be judicial acts. * * * It is the province of judges to determine what is the law upon existing cases. In fine, the law is applied by one and made by the other. To do the first, therefore—to compare the claims of parties with the law of the land before established—is in its nature a judicial act. To declare what the act is or has been is judicial power; to declare what the law shall be is legislative power.

Here, as I have said, applying this case to the provisions of this bill, we declare that unfair competition is unlawful, and the function of this commission in this aspect of the matter is to inquire whether or not the acts of the parties constitute a violation of the legislative declaration and then to issue their order upon that state of affairs; not to make a rule, not to make a law for the future.

As it seems to me, under this proposed law the power given is not to make a law within the limits of a certain primary standard, which would be a legislative act, but it is to interpret and apply and enforce a law already made, which is, in essence, a judicial act. If that be not the proper construction of it, and if the other view is to be taken of it, that by this provision with reference to unfair methods of competition or unfair competition we mean to give to this commission the power to make rules or to enact rules or laws within the limits of a primary standard, then the primary standard has not been laid down; and this amounts to an unlawful delegation of the legislative power of Congress; in other words, Congress could not say, "We appoint a commission and authorize that commission to pass such laws as it pleases or to deal with business conditions as it pleases." Obviouly that would be beyond our power, because that would be to delegate our power and our authority; but we may lay down a rule which marks accurately the limits to which the commission may go, and say, "This is our will, that unfair competition"—if that should be a definite term—"shall not exist, and within that standard you may make your subsidiary laws, so to speak."

As I have said, if the term "unfair competition" is not to be given its legal meaning, then nobody knows what the meaning is; we are upon a sea of uncertainty; it is left to the unrestricted discretion of this commission to declare anything that it pleases an unfair method of competition.

Now, I call attention upon that subject to a case in the Twenty-ninth Indiana Appeals Reports, page 217. That was a case where the law made it unlawful for any person to haul over a turnpike or over a gravel road, at any time when the road is thawing or is by reason of wet weather in a condition to be cut up and injured by the hauling, a load on a narrow-tired wagon of more than 2,000 pounds or on a broad-tired wagon a load of more than 2,500 pounds. The standard was that a narrow-tired wagon should not carry more than 2,000 pounds and a broad-tired wagon should not carry more than 2,500 pounds. That is about as definite, I think, as the provision in the bill authorizing the trade commission to deal with unfair methods of competition. The court said:

There must be some certain standard by which to determine whether an act is a crime or not; otherwise cases in all respects similar, tried before different juries, might rightfully be decided differently—

Just as different cases might be decided differently by different commissions or by commissions containing a different personnel—and a person might properly be convicted in one county for hauling over a turnpike in that county and acquitted in an adjoining county of a charge of hauling the same load on the same wagon over a turnpike in like condition in the latter county, because of the difference in conclusions of different judges and juries based upon their individual views of what should be the standard of comparison of tires, derived from their varying experience on the opinions of witnesses as to what difference of width of tires would constitute one wagon a narrow-tired wagon and another a broad-tired wagon.

Again, Mr. Spelling, in the work to which I have already referred, says:

The original scheme of our Government was for rule by laws interpreted and enforced according to their true meaning; and that scheme has been thus far kept constantly in view. That details of administration have been provided for by rules and regulations adopted and put in force by executive departments under power clearly defined argues nothing inconsistent with persistent adherence to the original scheme. Such minor laws can not be arbitrary; they must rest upon some standard fixed in the statute conferring the authority. The executive officer or commission may have a considerable latitude of discretion in reaching conclusions of fact; but, after all, it can do little more than make a measurement, or mathematical ascertainment, or physical examination, either by personal inspection or upon taking evidence. Nor would a necessity for scientific investigation and finding render the conferring of such power invalid. The case of Field v. Clark (143 U. S., 649), and that of Union Bridge Co. v. United States (204 U. S., 364), are instructive authorities on the whole subject. But it will be seen that these cases go as far as it is possible to go toward sanctioning pure delegations of the law-making function. A reading of the opinions will also show how promptly the court would declare to be invalid an enactment which failed to fix some prehensible and unmistakable standard for executive guidance.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] has offered an amendment which, if it were adopted, would render the situation still more confusing. He proposes to substitute for the language now in section 5 the provision "that unlawful or oppressive competition is hereby declared to be unlawful," and "the commission is authorized to prevent unfair or oppressive methods of competition." If the words "unfair methods of competition" are indefinite, what can we say for the word "oppressive"? What is "oppressive competition"? Can anybody tell? And yet the object of this amendment, I presume, is to clarify the situation. It is almost on a parallel with the ancient Chinese law. The provision of the penal code of China which is a sort of a basket clause, as our friends who are learned in tariff matters might say—and I am not certain but that it ought to be offered as a substitute—is quite as definite:

Whoever is guilty of improper conduct and of such as is contrary to the spirit of the law, though not a breach of any specific part of it, shall be punished at least 40 blows; and when the impropriety is of a serious nature, with 80 blows.

Here is an Arkansas law which denounced as a crime the committting of any act injurious to public morals, such as a man leaving his wife and child without the means of support. The case is reported in Forty-fifth Arkansas, at page 162. The court says:

The warrant returned in this case describes the offense as "committing an act injurious to public morals by leaving his wife and child without the means of support and living openly and publicly with one Dolly Hare."

The court says:

There could be no harm in living openly and publicly with Dolly Hare or anyone else unless Dolly Hare were a woman and they were cohabiting as husband and wife, which is not charged. Many men live openly and publicly with very estimable ladies, who are either relations, dependents, or friends.

But the court said:

The warrant alleges that the petitioner was convicted of the crime of committing an act injurious to the public morals by leaving his wife, etc.

Then they quote the provision of the statute and continue:

We are not aware that this act has ever been judicially questioned or ever in any case heretofore enforced. It has trickled down unnoticed in practice through all the digests, and finds its place in Mansfield's, section 1961.

I am very much afraid that if we pass this bill it will not trickle down unnoticed, which would be a very good thing to happen to it; I am afraid somebody will undertake to enforce it.

For want of something more definite, the justice of the peace has brought it now to bear upon Andrew Jackson, and it must be noticed. We can not conceive how a crime can, on any sound principle, be defined in so vague a fashion. Criminality depends, under it, upon the moral idiosyncrasies of the individuals who compose the court and jury. The standard of crime would be ever varying, and the courts would constantly be appealed to as the instruments of moral reform, changing with all fluctuations or moral sentiment. The law is simply null. The Constitution, which forbids ex post facto laws, could not tolerate a law which would make an act a crime, or not, according to the moral sentiment which might happen to prevail with the judge and jury after the act had been committed.

I call attention to still another case, and then I think I am through. First, I will quote from Mr. Willoughby upon this subject. He says:

The doctrine thus declared is without objection so long as the facts which are to determine the executive acts are such as may be precisely stated by the legislature and certainly ascertained by the executive. When this is not so, the officer intrusted with the execution of the law is necessarily vested with an independent judgment as to when and how the law shall be executed; and when this independence of judgment is considerable there is ground for holding that the law is not simply one in presenti to take effect in future, but is a delegation by the lawmaking body of its legislative discretion.

It seems clear to me that section 5 of this bill falls within the condemnation I have just read.

Here was another decision in Minnesota (100 Minn., p. 445) in which the court said:

Any statute * * * which attempts to authorize the commission, in its judgment, to allow an increase of the capital stock of a corporation for such purposes and on such terms or conditions as it may deem advisable would be a delegation of legislative power and void.

Now, I come to the California case. In California the legislature passed a law which authorized the State medical board to revoke the license of any physician who should make "grossly improbable statements" in advertisements. The court held that that law was utterly void as laying down no primary standard. The case is reported in Eighty-fourth Pacific Reporter, page 39. The court said:

It is insisted by petitioner that this particular provision of the act is unreasonable, uncertain, and indefinite; that neither the act itself nor the law defines what shall be deemed "grossly improbable statements"; that the provision in question leaves it entirely to the opinion of the persons who at any time may constitute the board to determine whether a given statement is "grossly improbable," and confers authority upon such board to create an offense under the act and inflict punishment for its commission; and that for these reasons this particular provision of the act in question is void. We think this position of the petitioner must be sustained.

What more does this bill do? It declares that if the commission finds that unfair methods of competition exist it shall issue its order. By what standard shall it operate? If it declares that a particular sort of conduct on the part of a corporation in fact constitutes an unfair method of competition, is not its decision about the matter final, if the legislation is valid, whether it would agree with the views of Congress if it were making the legislation itself or not?

The court continues:

The right of the physician to be secure in his privilege of practicing his profession is thus made to depend, not upon any definition which the law furnishes him as to what shall constitute "grossly improbable statements," but upon the determination of the board after the statement is made and simply upon its opinion of its improbability.

So here the trade commission is to determine, after the conduct has taken place, whether, in its opinion, the method adopted is an unfair method of competition, and if it thinks it is to forbid it.

No definite standard is furnished by the law under this provision whereby a physician with any safety can advertise his medical business; nor is there any definite rule declared whereby, after such an advertisement is had the Board of Medical Examiners shall be controlled in determining its probability or improbability.

* * * * * * *

And the provision of the act, even as to the judgment of the board, furnishes no standard by which that determination shall be arrived at. Taking the given advertisement by a physician the members of one board might conclude that it contained "grossly improbable statements," while another board might reach an entirely opposite conclusion. One might conclude that the statements while "improbable" were not "grossly" so. The advertisement of a physician which one board had determined did not come within the inhibition of the rule according to its judgment, a succeeding board might conclude did.

* * * * * * *

The right which a person possesses under the Constitution and the laws to practice his profession as a physician and surgeon can not be made to depend upon a provision of a statute as vague, uncertain, and indefinite as is the provision we have been considering.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for me to make a motion for an executive session?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator from Indiana makes the motion he has in mind, I desire to submit a proposed substitute for section 5 for printing and future consideration. It is a substitute for all that part of section 5 preceding the amendment adopted to-day. I desire to have it printed and lie on the table.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask that the amendment may be read in order that we may inform ourselves about its provisions.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is very short.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the reading? The Chair hears none.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 5, with the exception of the proviso agreed to this morning, insert the following:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. CUMMINS to the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes, viz: In lieu of section 5 as reported by the committee, except the amendment adopted July 27 at the end of section 5, insert the following:

"SEC. 5. That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful.

"The commission shall have authority to prevent such unfair competition in commerce in the manner following, to wit:

"Whenever it shall have reason to believe that any person, partnership, or corporation is violating the provisions of this section it shall issue and serve upon the defendant a complaint stating its charges in that behalf and at the same time a notice of hearing upon a day and at a place therein fixed. The person, partnership, or corporation so complained of shall have the right to appear at the place and time so fixed and show cause why an order should not be entered by the commission requiring such person, partnership, or corporation to cease and desist from the violation of the law so charged in said complaint.

"If upon such hearing the commission shall find that the person, partnership, or corporation named in the complaint is practicing such unfair competition it shall thereupon enter its findings of record and issue and serve upon the offender an order requiring that within a reasonable time to be stated in said order that the offender shall cease and desist from such unfair competition. The commission may at any time set aside, in whole or in part, or modify its findings or order so entered or made. Any suit brought by any such person, partnership, or corporation to annul, suspend, or set aside, in whole or in part, any such order of the commission shall be brought against the commission in a district court of the United States in the judicial district of the residence of the person or of the district in which the principal office or place of business is located, and the procedure set forth in the act of Congress making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies and insufficient appropriations for the fiscal year 1913, and for other purposes, relating to suit brought to suspend or set aside, in whole or in part, an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, shall apply.

"If within the time so fixed in the order of the commission, the person, partnership, or corporation against which the order is made shall not cease and desist from such unfair competition, and if in the meantime such order is not annulled, suspended, or set aside by a court, the commission may bring a suit in equity in a district court in any district wherein such person or persons reside or wherein such corporation has its principal office or place of business to enforce its said order, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to hear and determine any such suit and enforce obedience thereto according to the law and rules applicable to suits in equity. All the provisions of the law relating to appeals and advancement for speedy hearing in suits brought to suspend or set aside an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall apply in suits brought under this section."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 27, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou God and Father of all, above all, through all, and in us all, lift us, we pray Thee, day by day by Thy presence within to a larger, grander conception of life and its great responsibilities, that we may the more perfectly fulfill our destiny and thus work out our own salvation with fear and trembling through the precepts and example of Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, July 25, 1914, was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. This is District day——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering District legislation.

MANAGERS NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. FOSTER. To offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 581 (H. Rept. 1024).

The Committee on Rules begs leave to report the following in lieu of House resolution 545:

"Resolved, That immediately after the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to consider House joint resolution 241; that there shall not be exceeding one hour general debate on the resolution, to be equally divided between those supporting and those opposing the resolution; at the conclusion of such general debate the resolution may be read for amendments, and after consideration of the amendments thereto the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and amendments to final passage, without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to call the attention of the Speaker to House resolution No. 576, which was improperly referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs, and which should have been referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. There is no question about it having been referred to the wrong committee.

Mr. MANN. What is the resolution?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. House resolution No. 576, to investigate appointments to and removals from Government service in the Philippine Islands. It was introduced by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] on Saturday last and was referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs. It clearly should have been referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MANN. For what does it provide?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It provides for the investigation by a committee of five Members, appointed by the Speaker, into the administration of the civil-service laws of the Philippine Islands, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. Of course, if it provides for the appointment of a special committee——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It does. The first section of it reads:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of five members, each of whom shall be a Member of the House of Representatives, be appointed by the Speaker to investigate and ascertain—

And so forth.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the change of reference will be made from the Committee on Insular Affairs to the Committee on Rules.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had still further insisted upon its amendment No. 158 to the bill (H. R. 17824) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. BRYAN, and Mr. GALLINGER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5899) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House to bills of the following titles, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate:

S. 5501. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4969. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

JNO. H. STEPHENS.
C. D. CARTER.
CHAS H. BURKE.
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. It does not have to be moved. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] yield me a few moments' time? I would just as soon have it after the report is adopted, up to the disagreements, as now.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will make another motion for that.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Let the report be adopted, and then let the gentleman yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will not have any time to yield after the report is adopted.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is not a full report, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. MILLER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MILLER. I rise to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] to yield to me sufficient time to enable me to ask him two or three questions in reference to the conference report.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What does the gentleman say?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks the gentleman from Texas to yield to him sufficient time to enable him to ask some questions in regard to the conference report.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I simply desire to ask the gentleman from Texas a few questions in regard to the conference report.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. As to what items?

Mr. MILLER. There are several items on which I desire some information. I will refer first to amendment numbered 25, on page 13 of the bill, contained on page 3 of the report of the conferees. I find that the managers have raised the amount appropriated by the House, which amount is $116,000, not only up to the amount changed by the Senate, to $125,000, but even up to the amount of $135,000. In other words, the amount as contained in the conference report is $10,000 higher than the amendment made by the Senate, which in turn was $10,000 or thereabouts higher than the amount passed by the House. I have no doubt the reasons for this are ample, but I would like to inquire what they were. The report does not state.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is amendment numbered 25?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; that is the item for special agents—an item that has been attracting some attention when the bill has been considered during the past four years.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That addition was made, as I remember, on a statement from the Indian Department, to the effect that it was necessary in connection with the revolving fund that they are now using to a great extent in the Western States for the purpose of improving the condition of the Indians in agriculture and irrigation and other matters on which we are spending a vast sum of money at the present time.

Mr. MILLER. Do I understand from the gentleman from Texas that these special agents are to devote their time exclusively to instructing the Indians in agriculture, stock raising, and various domestic and industrial pursuits, or are they to occupy some of their time in protecting the Indians from the rapacity of their white neighbors in the protection of their property?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They are under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, through the Indian Bureau.

Mr. MILLER. I will make the question still more specific. Would any of these special agents work in Oklahoma? Will any of them have an opportunity to protect the minor Indian children whose estates are being probated in the probate courts there?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state to the gentleman that these special agents can be used in Oklahoma, or elsewhere, if the department so desires. There is no reservation in this language that would prevent sending them to Oklahoma on any special mission.

Mr. MILLER. May I ask the gentleman if the reason for increasing this appropriation so very materially was due to the fact that they desire to send these men into Oklahoma to look after probate estates, the special agents having been discontinued by another provision of the bill?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will say that the department has the special agents to look after various tribes. The Oklahoma Indians are under separate rules and regulations from the Indians in other parts of the United States; but there is nothing to prevent the interchange of the work of the special agents and sending them anywhere they please.

Mr. MILLER. Then, as a matter of fact, this increased appropriation will enable the department to maintain some of these special agents in Oklahoma to look after probate matters, if the department so desires, and they will take the place of the special agents discontinued by other parts of the bill?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will read lines 14 and 15, I think that fully explains the object of it—and for other necessary expenses of the Indian Service for which no other appropriation is available.

There is a special appropriation for Oklahoma, and it may be that there is special work required in Oklahoma, in some of these tribes, and this gives them an opportunity to send special agents there to do this work, in addition to the men who are already located there.

Mr. MILLER. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee with respect to amendment 24. When the bill passed the House the amount appropriated for the payment of Indian police was $150,000. The Senate increased that to $200,000. I could not see any possible reason for it, and I do not see any given in the report of the conferees. That is a very substantial and material increase over any amount carried for many years. I should like to inquire why that is.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The evidence before the committee was to the effect that a great deal of the trouble originating on these Indian reservations is on account of bootleggers, men who unlawfully bring whisky on the Indian reservations, and it is necessary to have these Indian policemen to work in connection with the special police force for the purpose of preventing the sale of intoxicating liquors among Indians.

Mr. MILLER. That is the exact purpose of my inquiry. This bill appropriates $150,000 to suppress the liquor traffic among the Indians, a very legitimate and much needed work. Is it designed that this is another appropriation of $50,000 for the same purpose, under another guise?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is designed that the Indian police shall work in concert with the regular force for the purpose of suppressing all kinds of crimes among the Indians. It is a police force that can be used for all purposes.

Mr. MILLER. Has the department furnished the conferees with evidence satisfactory to them that the present condition of morality or the present condition of crime among the Indian people requires this very enormous increase in the amount for police supervision?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state to the gentleman that this was furnished to the Senate after the bill went over there. Gentlemen will remember that this bill was in the Senate for several months, and additional investigations have been made by the department, and additional amounts have been requested. The gentleman is one of the alert members of the House Committee on Indian Affairs, and very active in the work of that committee, and the gentleman knows that we gave all the amounts that were asked by the department when we believed that it was the proper thing to do; but the Senate had before it more and later information than our committee had when it passed the bill, therefore the conferees agreed to the item of the Senate for this increase. The gentleman will remember that this $150,000 is to be distributed all over the United States, and it covers an enormous territory.

Mr. MILLER. I should like to ask the gentleman also about amendment 22. That amendment relates to the old time-honored controversy over the warehouses.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. We fought that out, up hill and down hill, for a good many years, the House always deciding one way and the Senate another. It seems that the favored spots have had their representatives in a place of influence, and those representatives have prevailed, although I congratulate the conferees on having gained something in the nature of a concession on our side of the case. I see this limits the number of warehouses to three. Heretofore there have been five. Where is it proposed to maintain these three? Let us see how that will satisfy the various gentlemen who represent these pet projects.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We thought we accomplished a great deal by getting rid of a part of them.

Mr. MILLER. I think the gentleman has accomplished something, but may I inquire where the remaining three are to be located?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It leaves the matter entirely in the hands of the department. The department heretofore could have reduced the number of these warehouses——

Mr. MILLER. That is exactly the point. There has been no time when they could not have reduced the number to three or reduced it to none, but they have not had the strength or the courage to do it. In other words, they have been cowardly about it. Now, you are going to write into law authority that they may maintain at least three.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They might have had three heretofore or they might have had only one.

Mr. MILLER. Because this provision here is tantamount to a recommendation on the part of Congress that there be three. But may I inquire where these three favored warehouses are going to be located? Has the department informed the gentleman as to where it is designed to maintain these three?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The department has the right to maintain them wherever they will best serve the interests of the Indians. A great many supplies have to be furnished for the Indians, and two things have especially to be considered. One is the question as to where the best market is to purchase these supplies and the other is the most available route by which they can be shipped to the Indians.

Mr. MILLER. Can the gentleman inform the House where the department contemplates maintaining these three warehouses?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I can not do that. It would be impossible. I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The conference report shows that there has been no agreement on item 23. What I desire to know is, when it would be in order to make a motion in reference to that item?

The SPEAKER. As soon as we dispose of the conference report.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to ask the gentleman one question with respect to Senate amendment No. 139, the amendment dealing with the Mississippi Choctaws. I had expected to offer a motion to this amendment to recede and concur in the Senate amendment, but I think I will not, and will allow it to go back to conference, hoping that the conferees can then agree on a settlement of the question. Now, I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact, because the conferees will have to do something with it in conference. In the latter part of that amendment No. 139 it says:

Provided, however, That the provisions of this act shall not be applicable to the members of the Choctaw Nation in Oklahoma until Congress shall have determined the rights of the Mississippi Choctaws whose names do not appear upon the approved rolls of the Choctaws in Oklahoma and until such of said Mississippi Choctaws as shall be found entitled to enrollment have been placed upon the rolls of citizenship of the Choctaw Nation.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the amendment read says "provisions of this act shall not be applicable." I think that ought to read "provisions of this paragraph shall not be applicable."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The paragraph is a part of the act, and the greater includes the less, and this amendment is in disagreement.

Mr. HARRISON. I know it is in disagreement, and therefore I wanted to call the attention of the gentleman to it so that he could correct it in conference. It should be "provision" where the word now appears "act."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We can take that into consideration.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move to further insist on the disagreement to the other amendments and ask for a conference.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman now yield to me.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, would the motion that I suggested a while ago be now in order?

The SPEAKER. That is according to what the gentleman's motion is.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I move to concur in Senate amendment 23 with an amendment by striking out the figures "25,000" and substituting the figures "10,000."

The SPEAKER. That is in order unless some gentleman wants to make a flat motion to recede and concur.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a separate vote on the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks for a separate vote on the various amendments, and, without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report amendment 23.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment 23, page 12, strike out line 16.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves to further insist on the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendment 23, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] makes a preferential motion to concur with an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, strike out the figures "25" and insert the figures "10."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am not very well informed as to the right of debate, but I would like to be heard.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How much times does the gentleman want?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Ten minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman from Texas give me three or four minutes?

Mr. MILLER. I want at least five minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the item in question is an appropriation for the expenses of the Board of Indian Commissioners. The House allowed $4,000 and the Senate increased that amount to $25,000. I am convinced that the first amount is too small, and that the second one is too large, and I have therefore substituted a motion for $10,000 as the proper amount.

The Board of Indian Commissioners is an independent body of men appointed by the President of the United States, who serve absolutely without any salary, and many of them are spending a good deal of their own money in investigating questions concerning the good of the Indians. In some of the work of investigation in Indian matters, in which I have had personal experience, I came in contact with several of these gentlemen.

At that time the president of the board was Dr. Draper, who had been president of the State University of Illinois, whom I knew personally, and talked with at length on this subject. Since then Dr. Draper has died and another has taken his place.

Another one was a Mr. Moorehead, connected with a theological seminary in Massachusetts. He did a great deal of very excellent work in connection with Indian affairs. The $4.000 allowed by the House would barely allow them to keep an office and employ a secretary, but do little else than that. I do not think they want as much as $25.000. With $4.000 they would be a good deal in the condition of an old farmer I heard of a number of years ago. He had quite a large bunch of very excellent stock on his farm. He also had a great big crib filled with splendid corn, but that year corn happened to be very high, about 75 cents a bushel, and he hated like the mischief to feed it out to the cattle. He finally compromised between his judgment and his inclination on the subject and he fed the cattle just a little corn from day to day, enough to keep them alive, and but little more than that. He kept on doing that until the corn was all fed out. The result was the cattle were barely kept alive, but did not grow, and the corn disappeared, so that he had little left on either side. If he had been wise he would have given the cattle enough to make them grow. Then he could have marketed them in time to save some of his corn and thus save something both ways.

If we give this board $4.000, you feed them the way the old farmer fed his stock, and will not get good results, whereas if we give enough to accomplish something, they can and will do a great deal in the field they are working in. They do a work that is done by no other body. They are supplementing the efforts of the Indian Bureau, and everything they have done is in the line of elevating the Indian race. It seems to me that if the board is to be continued at all they ought to have a reasonable appropriation. Ten thousand dollars is not a very large appropriation, when you consider what they must have to maintain an office, a secretary, and other expenses. As I understand it, this is one of the points, if not the one point in conference upon which the conferees seem unable to agree. I therefore propose to cut down the higher allowance and raise the lower allowance and give the board such a reasonable amount as will enable it to continue doing this useful work. [Applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that the amount asked for by the department for this commission was $5,000, and the House reduced the amount to $4.000, and that has been the amount carried for a number of years. The Senate, by amendment No 23, raised the amount to $25.000. I desire to state that this Board of Indian Commissioners was first known as a board of peace commissioners. It was authorized by Congress about 40 years ago under President Grant's administration. At that time many of the Indian tribes in the West were hostile to the whites, and, as they expressed it, had gone upon the warpath; and the Army officers were not very successful in quelling these disturbances. They had the idea that a good many western men entertained and freely expressed, that all the good Indians are dead Indians. The people of the East did not agree with that contention, especially the humanitarians of the East, and they urged that these uprisings could and should be prevented by peaceful means. This condition of affairs led to the creation of a board of peace commissioners selected from the East to go among these Indians and influence them by peaceful means to make treaties of peace with the United States Government. There was appropriated by Congress the sum of $30,000 the first year for that purpose. For a number of years this commission was known as the peace commission. It is now called the Board of Indian Commissioners. The Board of Indian Commissioners accomplished many years ago the purpose for which it was created; all of the Indians are now on their reservations, and there is not a hostile band of Indians in this country. Why, may I ask, should we continue to appropriate money annually to keep in office 10 useless men, described in the law creating the commission as "men eminent for their intelligence and philanthropy"? This useless body of official misfits only illustrates the fact that when the nose of a Republican camel once gets in the Treasury tent you can never pull it out again.

This body of men have been in office since 1869—45 years. These offices could and should have been abolished within 10 years after they were created. There is an old legal maxim, disputed by none, that "when the reason for a law ceases the law itself should cease." This board of so-called Indian Commissioners has too often contained men who did not desire the good of the Indians so much as they did the good of the party giving them their appointments or of the church to which they belonged. For that reason, instead of keeping it in existence and throwing away $4,000 upon it, it should be abolished. There is not another department of this Government, besides the Indian Department, that has to be supervised. Why should not the War Department, for instance, which annually spends multiplied millions of dollars for supplies, or the Navy Department that spends an immense amount of money annually without any supervision by a commission of "holier than thou" pretensions, be also supervised? Why do you only find in the Indian Department such a commission? Are the men in that department all crooks and in the other departments all saints?

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Not at the present time. Mr. Abbott, the secretary of this board, at a banquet given him by the merchants of San Francisco recently stated he was out there for the purpose of helping the merchants of San Francisco to get their part of these Indian purchases. Now, that was certainly wrong, for he had no authority to speak for the commission. The Indian Department purchases these goods where they can be purchased cheapest and without regard to building up the trade of any special city. We have in the Indian Bureau the very best purchasing agents that can be had. So has the Army service and the Navy service, and if a special board of supervisors is necessary for the Indian Service why are they not also necessary for the other departments of the Government?

Mr. Moorehead, the commissioner mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] a few moments ago, went to Oklahoma last year and by unjust criticisms of Indian officials there stirred up more trouble for the Indian Bureau than has ever before occurred in the settlement of the matters of the Five Tribes.

Mr. Speaker, the Board of Indian Commissioners was created in 1869. Its members serve without salary and maintain an office in Washington, for the expenses of which and of travel Congress has made special or annual appropriations. Although the board reports to the Secretary of the Interior, it is not a bureau or division of the Interior Department, but rather a body of private citizens purposely kept reasonably free from governmental control, debarred from salaries, and afforded opportunities for investigation in order that they may freely express an intelligent and impartial opinion on matters pertaining to Indian administration. This advisory function of the board and its other duties are defined in the following extracts from an Executive order and laws:

[From Revised Statutes of the United States, 1874.]

SEC. 2039. There shall be a Board of Indian Commissioners, composed of not more than 10 persons, appointed by the President solely, from men eminent for intelligence and philanthropy, and who shall serve without pecuniary compensation. (Apr. 10, 1869, 16 Stat., 40.)

SEC. 2041. The board of commissioners mentioned in section 2039 shall supervise all expenditures of money appropriated for the benefit of Indians within the limits of the United States; and shall inspect all goods purchased for Indians, in connection with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, whose duty it shall be to consult the commission in making purchases of such goods. (July 15, 1870, 16 Stat., 360.)

SEC. 2042. Any member of the Board of Indian Commissioners is empowered to investigate all contracts, expenditures, and accounts in connection with the Indian Service, and shall have access to all books and papers relating thereto in any Government office; but the examination of vouchers and accounts by the executive committee of said board shall not be a prerequisite of payment. (May 29, 1872, 17 Stat., 186.)

[From act of May 17, 1882 (22 Stat., 70).]

And hereafter the commission shall only have power to visit and inspect agencies and other branches of the Indian Service, and to inspect goods purchased for said service, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall consult with the commission in the purchase of supplies. The commission shall report their doings to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of the Interior, through the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, has included in the estimates for the Indian appropriation bill (1913) an item of $5,000 for the expenses of the Board of Indian Commissioners. Since the fiscal year 1895 the appropriation has been $4.000 annually. For five years prior to 1895 it was $5,000. Before 1890 it varied from $2,000 to $25,000, some appropriations being made for irregular periods.

In defense of the proposed increase there is submitted the following statement:

The Board of Indian Commissioners, created in 1869, is unique in being probably the only commissioned body of the United States whose members draw no salaries. Its status is also unique in that it is not a bureau or division of any department and that its members are "appointed by the President solely, from men eminent for their intelligence and philanthropy." Its purpose. as stated by Congress in the act of April 10, 1869 (16 Stat., 40), was that "of enabling the President" to carry out the then new peace policy of dealing with the Indians. Its original duty, as defined by Executive order of June 3, 1869, was, in brief:

To "determine upon the recommendations to be made as to the plans of civilizing or dealing with the Indians, and submit the same for action," subject to approval "by the Executive or the Secretary of the Interior"; to communicate "advice as to changes in modes of purchasing goods or conducting the affairs of the Indian Bureau," and, if necessary, to file complaints against officers in the Indian Service.

The obvious intent of these unusual provisions was the creation of an advisory body, having the sanction of the Government and yet reasonably free from governmental restraint or influence, with the right and duty of forming and expressing an impartial opinion on Indian affairs, thereby assisting the administration to guard against the great danger of error, fraud, and injustice to which Indian adminstration is peculiarly exposed. This has always been the chief function of the board and the source of most of its public service.

That the board might properly carry out this duty it was given broad powers, including:

1. To inspect the records of the Indian Office and to obtain full information as to the conduct of all parts of the affairs thereof.
2. To inspect, in person or by subcommittee, the various Indian superintendencies and agencies in the Indian country.
3. To be present, in person or by subcommittee, at purchases of goods for Indian purposes, and inspect said purchases, advising with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs with regard thereto.
4. To provide for the manner in which their communications with and advice to the Government shall be made and authenticated.

It is especially significant that inspection of supplies was originally not a duty, but only an incidental right. Congress on July 15, 1870 (16 Stat., 360), made it mandatory.

Congress also, between 1870 and 1872 (Rev. Stat., secs. 2041, 2042), imposed on the board the strenuous additional duty of supervising all expenditures of money appropriated for Indian purposes, and gave it the right to investigate all contracts, expenditures, and accounts in connection with the Indian Service. When the great amount of clerical work thus involved seemed unnecessary, Congress passed the act of May 17, 1882 (22 Stat., 70), which reads in part:

And hereafter the commission shall only have power to visit and inspect agencies and other branches of the Indian Service, and to inspect goods purchased for said service, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall consult with the commission in the purchase of supplies. The commission shall report their doings to the Secretary of the Interior.

This act has sometimes been interpreted alone as confining the board's work to cooperation with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in the purchase of supplies. Generally, however, it was interpreted as restoring the board's status under the Executive order of June 3, 1869, and the act of July 15, 1870, with the following principal duties:

1. To determine upon and make recommendations as to methods of dealing with the Indians and of conducting the affairs of the Indian Bureau.
2. To cooperate with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in the purchase of supplies.

That this interpretation was contemplated in the act of May 17, 1882, and is correct seems apparent because—

1. The act also appropriated $4,700 and specifically directed that $3,200 should be used for secretary's salary and office expenses and $1,500 for travel. Congress could hardly consider the maintenance of an office at an expense of $3,200 necessary to direct an expenditure of $1,500 for the single purpose of inspecting Indian supplies. Moreover, the apportionment compares very closely with the needs for which the board now asks $5,000.
2. The sweeping "power to visit and inspect agencies and other branches of the Indian Service" would seem to imply something beyond mere inspection of goods.
3. Every Congress since 1882 has made an appropriation for the expenses of the board which has all the time been acting under the liberal interpretation of the act of 1882. Had not this been warranted the fact would surely have been discovered in less than 30 years.
4. This interpretation has been recognized by every President, and, with one exception, by every Secretary of the Interior since 1882; and in the single exception noted the point was conceded in the board's favor.
5. Any other construction ignores the original reason for creating the board, its history, and common thought and usage concerning it.

The funadmental idea underlying the board's work and giving value to its recommendations is that of impartiality. It was designed and organized to furnish an impartial viewpoint, with special heed to the prevention of injustice and the recommendation of progressive measures. Its best work has been along that line. Its unsalaried members, as disinterested parties, are bound to take into consideration divergent views regarding Indian matters. This necessitates the maintenance of an office, which must keep in close touch with Indian legislation and administration and with the lines of thought represented by missionary and philanthropic societies and by private individuals interested in the Indians. The scattered residences of the members make such an office indispensable as a medium of communication and action. It is necessary that the board hold annually at least two meetings. It is equally important that one or more members make frequent trips to portions of the Indian field, in order that the board may have the benefit of first-hand observation and knowledge. The combined expense of maintaining the office and of travel incident to board meetings is usually between $3,700 and $3,800 annually. An appropriation of $4,000, therefore, allows a balance ridiculously small for the work of visiting and inspecting branches of the Indian Service and of assisting in the purchase of supplies. When this handicap is considered, it is submitted that the board has done its work with a fair degree of efficiency.

If the foregoing statement is correct, it would seem that since 1894 there has existed the anomalous condition of a board unable to fully perform its duties because it has lacked funds and of Congresses that have failed to provide adequate funds, presumably because they believed the board was not performing its duty. Certainly there should be no difficulty and every advantage in reaching a frank understanding as to the duties of the board and the amount of money needed to perform them.

There are appended to this statement:

(a) A table showing the average expenses of the board for the past five years.
(b) A copy of that portion, in full, of the act of May 17, 1882, referring to the board.

And hereafter the commission shall only have power to visit and inspect agencies and other branches of the Indian Service and to inspect goods purchased for said service, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall consult with the commission in the purchase of supplies. The commission shall report their doings to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. Speaker, I desire further to call the attention of the House to Senate amendment No. 37, on page 21 of the bill. The following letter from Commissioner Sells fully explains that item and explains why it should be retained in the bill:

MY DEAR MR. STEPHENS: I have the honor to invite your attention to the following item, originally in the pending Indian bill but stricken out by the Senate:

"For improvement and sinking of wells, installation of pumping machinery, construction of tanks for domestic and stock water, and for the necessary structures for the development of a supply of water for domestic use for eight Papago Indian villages in southern Arizona, $20,000." (H. R. 12579, p. 21, line 6.)

It appears from the Senate debate on this item (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 22–23, 1914, pp. 11840–11843, 11915–11917) that this action was taken owing to certain objections to the item in its present form.

In view of the fact that this project is vitally important to the welfare of the Indians in these villages, I submit below further information in the premises, a portion thereof being taken from report of House hearings on the Indian appropriation bill (pp. 322–326) and repeated here for your convenience:

Statistics, eight Papago villages.

Census, 1913 (present irrigable area undetermined)	1,423
Irrigated area, acres (acres under completed project depend upon water found	873.7
Acres cultivated by Indians	873.7
Acres cultivated by whites	None.
Value of irrigated land per acre	$100
Expended to June 30, 1913	Nothing.
Estimate for fiscal year 1915	$35,600
Cost of completed project	$35,600

The Indians of this territory have had little or no aid from the Government and are a bright and energetic people, for Indians. Their principal source of revenue is that of stock raising, and this could be made a source of much greater revenue for them if it were not for the fact that the water supply for use of the stock is very limited and hard to obtain. Frequently the feed is ample in a locality, but water is at such a great distance that stock can not subsist. The estimate on this contemplates the sinking of wells, or the improvement of those already constructed, the installation of a pump and small distillate engine, the construction of excavated tanks for domestic and stock water, and the erection of a small structure over the pump and engine.

There are eight villages which are much in need of these improvements. Others might in the future require the same. The villages included are:

Name.	Location.	Population.	Cultivated acreage.
Cockleburr	Tp. 8 S. R. 4 S	200	200
Chiu-Chiuschu	Tp. 8 S. R. 5 E	200	188
Ko-Opke	Tp. 8 S. R. 5 E	75	104
Taht-Mohmeli	Tp. 9 S. R. 5 E	100	50
Komelih	Tp. 10 S. R. 4 E	150	4
Quajoti	Tp. 10 S. R. 4 E	100	245
Anegam	Tp. 12 S. R. 3 E	200	218
Santa Rosa	Tp. 12 S. R. 3 E	400	294

The cost of individual pumping plants is estimated as follows:

Sinking well 6 inches diameter 200 feet, at $5	$1,000
Pump	800
Gas engine	400
Domestic water-storage tank	500
Stock water-storage tank	750
Structures, buildings for pump, engines, etc	500
Engineering and incidentals	500
Total	4,450

This project is entirely distinct from the $50,000 item for similar work on the Papago Reservation, and can have no effect whatever upon the water supply of the city of Tucson, which has an elevation of 2,387 feet. These villages are located 75 miles north and west of Tucson, at considerably lower elevation, ranging from 1,450 to 1,800 feet. The designation "Nomadic Papagos" is perhaps something of a misnomer for these particular Indians, as they have resided in said villages for many years, only leaving them temporarily when forced to do so by lack of water. By rude methods they have developed a small water supply from shallow hand-dug wells only sufficient for their barest necessities.

An exhaustive report has been received in regard to water conditions among these Indians, and for your information there is attached hereto copy of extracts from that portion thereof relating to the eight villages in question, three of which are located on land already reserved for their exclusive benefit, viz: Cockleburr, Ko-Opke, and Taht-Mohmeli.

Many of these Indians own a few head of stock and cultivate small tracts of land. It will be noted that rudely constructed wells already exist in a number of these villages, and if the present wells can be improved, enlarged, and properly cased, other wells dug, and pumping plants installed, as contemplated, such action will contribute very materially to their well-being; and, in fact, is absolutely essential to their progress. Under present conditions it is extremely difficult for many of these Indians to maintain themselves and families owing to the lack of an adequate water supply for domestic and stock purposes.

In conclusion, I most earnestly recommend that this item be reinserted in the bill, for the following reasons: An additional water supply is vitally necessary to the welfare and progress of the Indians in these villages; this project can have no effect whatever upon the water supply of the city of Tucson, the villages being located about 75 miles north and west thereof at much lower elevation; and the contemplated withdrawal of the lands therein not already reserved for the Indians will not reduce the area of public domain available for homestead entry in that section, as the Indian's right of occupancy and use in a number of cases almost from time immemorial would be recognized in any event as against other parties, whether or not the land is ever formally set aside exclusively for such purposes by executive order or otherwise.

Very truly, yours,

CATO SELLS, Commissioner.

Hon. JOHN H. STEPHENS,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,
House of Representatives.

COCKLEBURR.

This village is 14½ miles southwest of Casa Grande on the old Vekol road. These are the most thrifty and prosperous of any of the Papagos yet visited, which prosperity I attribute to a better water supply * * * than many of the other villages have.

Domestic water supply for this village is furnished by two wells 150 feet in depth, with 4 or 5 feet of water. These wells being open—the box or curbing supporting the windlass being crude, open affairs in poor repair—the wells are exposed to dust, dirt, and reptiles. None of the wells are walled up or lined, and earth from some of the softer strata is continually disintegrating and falling into the wells. All these causes render the water supply anything but pure and wholesome.

It is suggested that one of the first things done should be the protection of these wells and the installation of a quicker and more adequate method of drawing water. I am told on good authority that several head of live stock—horses and cattle—die every summer from lack of water, and I know that there is great suffering among the stock from this cause. If pumps, tanks, and watering troughs could be installed at these wells it would contribute more to the health, cleanliness, and so forth, of these Indians than anything I know of.

TAHT-MOHMELI.

This village is 1½ miles southwest of the Jack Rabbit Mine. These Indians are in a condition bordering on destitution. They have few fields, as their supply of water for irrigation is small and uncertain. This supply is obtained by a system of storm-water ditches, which intercept the branches of a small wash flowing through the village and carry it to the fields. Their crops this season are nearly a total failure. Their white neighbors state they are honest and industrious. Some of them are employed at the near-by mines when these are operating.

Few, if any, of these people have attended school. There is only one person in the village who can speak any English.

Water for domestic use and for stock is obtained from a well 84 feet in depth. This well, like the ones at Vahlwavaw or Cockleburr, is open, is not walled up or lined, and some of the softer strata are sloughing off and caving badly.

CHIU-CHIUSCHU.

Chiu-Chiuschu is one of the largest and most populous of the Indian villages along the Santa Cruz and tributaries. Although their water supply is small and uncertain, these Indians seem to enjoy some degree of prosperity. Their land is very fertile, and nearly all of the fields have produced fairly good crops this season. These people show considerable skill and industry in the cultivation of their fields and in irrigating them. Many of the fields are surrounded by levees for the purpose of holding the water until it thoroughly soaks into the ground. The principal crops are corn, cane, beans, squashes, melons, and so forth.

Several of these Indians have attended school and speak English. A mission is maintained by the Catholic Church.

Water for domestic use and for stock is obtained from two wells, 57 feet and 60 feet deep, respectively. Like all the others, these wells are open, and water is drawn in buckets.

QUAJOTI.

This village is about 7 miles west of the Jack Rabbit Mine and about 4 miles east of the Reward Mine. Water for domestic purposes is obtained from a well about 210 feet in depth, which was dug by these people about 15 years ago.

KOMELIH.

This village is about 7 miles southwest of the Jack Rabbit Mine. A well 160 feet deep was dug by whites in 1884–85 for station on the Quijotoa Road. The Indians moved in after the well was abandoned by the whites. Very little land—only a few garden patches—is in cultivation at this place, aggregating about 4 or 5 acres.

KO-OPKE.

This settlement is a short distance from the main road from Casa Grande to the Jack Rabbit Mine. There are in cultivation about 100 acres, irrigated by storm water from the surrounding territory. The water supply is deficient and uncertain. Domestic water is obtained from a well 78 feet in depth.

ANEGAM.

This village, usually called Upper Santa Rosa, is about 16 miles southwest of the Jack Rabbit Mine. Water is obtained from a wash of considerable size that emerges from the Sheridan Mountains, a short distance west of the village. The wash from which the water is obtained has a loose gravelly bottom and there is probably a considerable underflow. Water for domestic use and for stock is conserved in a tank or small reservoir. There is no well at this place, and the tank from which the domestic supply is secured is very insanitary, as it is not fenced in and all the Indians' cattle and horses secure water from the same source.

SANTA ROSA.

This is the largest and most populous of the Indian villages of the Santa Rosa Valley. Aside from being the most prosperous, it is probably one of the oldest. Near the village there are the remains of many ditches and tanks, said to be the remains of prehistoric irrigation systems. In the immediate vicinity also there have been found pottery and remains of weapons and implements supposed to have belonged to the ancient Aztecs.

There is no well here, and water for domestic use and the supply for the live stock is taken from the same tank. This tank is not fenced in and is very insanitary. The supply was practically exhausted in October, 1912, and these people were hauling water from Anegam and from Brownell.

I now yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] five minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, it happens I do not know Mr. Abbott, who has been mentioned, and I do not know any member of this board of commissioners, but I am for the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield to me then?

Mr. MURDOCK. I thought the gentleman had yielded to me.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I had, but I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Does not the gentleman think other departments of the Government should be supervised also? If it is necessary to supervise the Interior Department, then let us have the War Department and the Navy Department and the White House and all the rest of them supervised.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will answer the gentleman from Texas, no; I do not think other departments should be supervised, but I do think that there is peculiarily in the Indian Service warrant for the existence of just this sort of supervisory commission. Now, it happens the gentleman from Texas and myself come from the same section of the country. He lives in northwestern Texas and I live in southern Kansas. Both of us have had our homes for years on the margin of the Indian country. Both of us know the early attitude of many of the pioneers of that section toward the Indians. I say to the gentleman from Texas that as a boy probably I shared that unfriendly attitude toward the American Indian; but as an adult and with a broader view in these later years, I have come to know that the way the American people have treated the aborigines of this country has been for the most part shameful.

It was natural, in the course of events, that the Indian should be segregated and removed to a small tract of territory, small compared with his original holdings. But in his guardianship the white man has not been kindly with the Indian. Our supervision over him in schools and on reservations is not pleasant to review. Here is a proposition, no matter what its origin may have been back in 1869, which gives to some 11 men—men of parts, men who serve without pay—the right to view the condition of these Indians—the remnant of the tribes, wherever they may be found in the United States—with a view of interceding with official Washington in their behalf. These men have done notable service, meritorious service, in the past. I think that their activities ought to be continued, and they ought to be given funds commensurate with their duties. Four thousand dollars will not go very far in making inquisition and investigation into Indian affairs; $10,000 will probably permit it, to some extent. I see no reason why Congress should hang back because of the difference.

We have driven the Indians into a little area. We have tried to civilize them. We have many of them segregated in schools. I want to say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] that during my service in Congress I have received more complaints about the conduct in Indian schools than I have over any other item of this Government.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman know that these commissioners have nothing to do with the Indian schools, but only with the purchase of supplies?

Mr. MURDOCK. They can investigate all parts of Indian affairs, I understand.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. So can I. But their investigation is only as to the purchase of supplies.

Mr. MURDOCK. They made a very meritorious and efficient investigation in Oklahoma in regard to probate, and conditions in that regard, I understand, have since been largely corrected as the result of these investigations. I hope the House will in this small measure, at least, do justice to the American Indian by giving him the benefit of supervision by men who are not hampered by Government red tape, and who are not hindered by bureau practices or bureau prejudices.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] to increase the amount carried in the House bill from $4,000 to $10,000. I do it because, in my opinion, the Board of Indian Commissioners is an efficient and valuable adjunct to the Government of the United States in the administration of all Indian affairs. In the first place, this board is composed of men of the very highest standing in the respective parts of the United States in which they live. They are not narrow, prejudiced, small, biased men with an ax to grind. They are not men with preconceived notions that they desire to have put into effect. They are men whose broad spirit and high-minded character have caused them to enlist in a great humanitarian effort to see that justice, and pure justice, is done to the Indians. Go to the homes of every one of these men and you will find, I dare say, not a living being in the community in higher esteem than the member of this Board of Indian Commissioners. So much for the board.

Now, a word as to their work. I am not at all in accord with the distinguished chairman of the Indian Affairs Committee in his statement that the efficiency of this board is not of very great caliber and that its activities are to be restricted to a very few and minor matters. That was more than likely true at the inception and beginning of the workings of this organization, but it is not true to-day. It is not true to-day because the conscience of the American people has grown acute over Indian affairs. It is not true because to-day the American people have come to a new understanding and to cry "halt" upon the devastation of Indian property, the pauperizing of Indian minors, and the robbery of Indian full bloods throughout the United States. It is by reason of this changed condition of affairs that this board has come into being with strength and with a mission.

Now, let us see some of the activities of this commission during the past year or year and a half. Verily, they have been rendering an important work, and thereby we find a reason why they should be continued.

Mr. Speaker, ever since I have been a member of the Indian Affairs Committee of this House there have been many lines of Government activity dealing with Indian affairs about which I have known little or nothing, about which I could find no one who knew anything, but upon which no man on the floor of this House has a right to vote unless he knows something.

I refer, first, to the irrigation of Indian lands. How many men are there either on or off the Indian Affairs Committee of the House or Senate who can tell whether a project that has been tried or appropriated for is a feasible or proper one for the Indians, whether it is one that should be reimbursable from the funds of the Indians, and to what extent are the whites interested, rather than the Indians, in the project? Mr. Speaker, we have such a lack of information about these propositions for which each year we are spending literally millions of dollars that when we act we literally convict ourselves of incompetence. It was three years ago I asked the Committee on Indian Affairs to pass a resolution, and they passed it as a committee, but did not bring it into the House, calling for an investigation of the whole subject of the irrigation of these lands, in order that we might know something about it. I am very pleased to see that during the past year that work which the Indian Affairs Committee halted, or, rather, which they did not feel it was advisable to undertake, the Board of Indian Commissioners has undertaken. They have had an expert, a man skilled in Indian affairs, investigating conditions throughout the United States where these projects are located, and that gentleman has made an elaborate report, that is now available for the membership of the House. In that report alone he shows in the present bill where there can be saved to the Treasury of the United States a quarter of a million dollars. But gentlemen will stand on the floor of this House and say that this board is not of value to the Government.

Mr. Speaker, one thing more. Passing from that important item, there are many others that confront us immediately. One of the great points of controversy we have had buffeted back and forth during recent years is the condition of affairs in Oklahoma. I understand it was said a moment ago, in order that a little aspersion might be cast, perhaps, on the membership of this Board of Indian Commissioners, that one of its members, a distinguished professor from New England, traveled to Oklahoma and mussed things up. Thank God he "mussed things up." He mussed things up as they ought to have been mussed up long ago, and it is to be noted here and now that the present Democratic Commissioner of Indian Affairs put the sanction of his approval upon the report of that distinguished professor after he himself had made a personal investigation in Oklahoma; and, my dear sirs, if it is of any advantage to have in the consideration of Indian affairs knowledge, skill, advice from high-minded and disinterested men, whose thoughts are for the Indian and for the honor of the American people, then this Board of Indian Commissioners should be perpetuated with decency and distinction.

Now, another thing that this last year was performed by a member of the Board of Indian Commissioners. How many times has there appeared upon the floor of this House a controversy over whether or not the sawmill plant we built on the Menominee range in Wisconsin was a going concern or not, whether we had wasted and squandered the Indians' money, and whether we had squandered the Indians' property? What were the facts? I did not know. How many gentlemen here know? I have heard a great many conflicting statements made; but the subject, so far as I know, had never been investigated by a man who really understood the sawmill and lumbering business—until when? Until within the last year, when a member of this Board of Indian Commissioners, who is a distinguished and skilled lumberman, made such an investigation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have three minutes more, if I may. I ask the chairman of the Indian Committee to give me five minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman three minutes, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MILLER. Then, Mr. Speaker, in addition to that, we have undertaken recently to do something in response to a demand that came from good people throughout the country that something should be done for the prisoners who are at the Fort Sill Reservation in Oklahoma, and the proposition was advanced to transport them from the prison reservation to the Mescalero Indian Reservation in New Mexico. We did it. I thought it was a wise step. But I think we squandered a lot of money in doing it. I think we were foolish in the way it was done. When I say "squandered" I do not think the object was inappropriate, but I think the amount appropriated was vastly in excess of the needs of the situation. There has, however, arisen a great deal of controversy over that. I have read it in the newspapers and have heard it stated on fairly decent authority that we had committed a great crime upon these people whom we have nursed in the lap of luxury for 50 years in setting them up in business for themselves, locating them on farms, and providing them with implements and equipments—that notwithstanding all this we had still committed a crime upon them. A member of this Board of Indian Commissioners went there and made an investigation of that, and his report is available.

So I might go on and show, item by item, how this board, composed of such men as I have described, have performed a notable service for the American Indians and the American people; and they have, every one of them, done it out of their own pockets, because not one cent has ever been paid by the Government, either for their expenses or for their time. They have had such a high-minded conception of their work that they have gone into their own pockets and paid for the work.

Now, it seems to me that under these circumstances we can in common decency only recognize them by giving them a decent appropriation; not $25,000, as suggested by the Senate, nor the paltry $4,000 that was passed by the House; but let us make it still a fair golden mean and grant the $10,000 suggested by the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in the district I have the honor to represent we have some 12 or 13 tribes of Indians in one large and two or three small reservations. In spite of all the good work that is accredited to this Board of Indian Commissioners, I can not help but note the fact that the Indians away out on the Pacific coast seem to be getting a little bit worse off each year.

Regulations, rules, instructions, and orders are increasing in number. Nowadays the Quiniault Indians are even told when they may and when they may not go up and down their own river in their own boats. What the Indians have, or what they think they have, or what they hope to have, seems to be either controlled in one way or uncontrolled in another until each year the western Washington Indians seems to be in a little more distress or a little nearer starvation. I do not know that this board has ever been near the Quiniaults. I doubt if the board has, and if the board is so good and so valuable as has been stated, let me suggest that the great Quiniault Reservation offers a fine field of endeavor. Surely this board or any board of commissioners can not make matters worse and more uncertain than they are.

I am pleased to indorse what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, has said in regard to the impossibility of getting rid of boards and commissions in all branches of the Government once they are started. Why, Mr. Chairman, we have before us this very day a rule brought in by the Democratic Rules Committee, which rule permits this Congress to act for the perpetuation and appointment of members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. That is all very well, but it does seem as though the time should come when the number of members of that board could be reduced.

Who knows how many boards and commissions we have engaged in running this Government? More than anyone suspects, I venture, and still more being made. The State Department, I am told, has more commissions hanging onto it than any other, and some of them move in a mysterious way their wonders to perform. There is even now, I am informed, about to start for Great Britain a commission for the settlement of foreign claims. That commission was authorized originally, no doubt, for some particular reason, and it will never quit. There will always be claims ahead. I have heard that commission spent $180,000 last year to settle $8,000 worth of claims. I wish I had the exact figures. I am informed, too, that this commission expended $400 for inkwells. There must be some mistake about this report. Why, $400 worth of inkstands would be a carload of inkstands [laughter], and would provide for an awful lot of ink slinging.

But, Mr. Speaker, that is the way it goes—commission here and special board there; like the suckers, one is born every minute and none ever die, and if all these Federal commissions and boards have done no more for the whole country than the Board of Indian Commissioners have done for the fish-eating tribes of Washington State, then all should be abolished; the quicker the better. I support the position taken by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS].

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WINGO). The gentleman from Texas demands the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 24.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the next amendment be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I asked for a separate vote a little while ago. I am willing that the rest of the amendments be considered together.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I move, Mr. Speaker, that they be considered together.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves to further insist on the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendments—numbered what?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Nos. 23, 27, 81, 82, 139, and 155.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota rose.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] is recognized.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to discuss any of the amendments that are still in disagreement, neither do I care to discuss the conference report, except to refer briefly to one Senate amendment which has been agreed to in conference with an amendment. I refer to Senate amendment 136, which as it has been agreed to is legislation that is just and that should have been enacted several years ago. It provides for the putting upon the rolls of the Five Civilized Tribes a number of persons who were omitted from the enrollment that closed on March 4, 1907. The Senate amendment only provided for enrolling these persons, but as agreed to in conference it not only provides for their enrollment, but fixes the amount of money each one will receive in lieu of an allotment, there being no tribal lands left for allotment. I have strenuously insisted for a number of years that these persons who are now added to the rolls should be enrolled before the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes are closed up and the estate distributed. It was admitted that there were persons entitled to enrollment that were omitted from one cause or another, and it has always seemed to me that it was the duty of the Government to see that they were taken care of, and I have tried to convince the officials of the department, the tribal officials, and the Representatives from Oklahoma that they ought to make up a list of the persons that were manifestly entitled to be enrolled, and it is a source of much pleasure to me that this has finally been done and these persons will now be added to the rolls. This, in my opinion, will mean the closing up at an early date of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, and will result in the final distribution of their estate. There may be some other claims for enrollment that ought to be inquired into and considered before there is a final settlement, notably the claim of the Mississippi Choctaws, but the provision agreed to in conference that I have just discussed will very materially facilitate the winding up of the affairs of the Five Tribes.

Mr. Speaker, I rose particularly to speak with reference to a portion of the bill on page 62, under the title, "Five Civilized Tribes." I was unavoidably absent from Washington when the Indian appropriation bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs last January. I was also absent when the bill was considered in Committee of the Whole and when it passed the House. If I had been present when the bill was considered I would have opposed some of the legislation affecting the Five Civilized Tribes, and particularly the provision beginning on line 7, page 62, of the bill, which provides that the offices of the Commissioner of the Five Tribes and the Union Agency shall be consolidated and a commissioner authorized to be appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate. My objection to this provision is that it proposes to take out of the classified service an important office and to fill it by a political appointment. I do not believe that it is in the interest of good administration or for the best interests of the Five Civilized Tribes. Our friends from Oklahoma defend this legislation by stating that it is in the interest of economy, eliminating an unnecessary position and making one official do the work that two now perform. When the last Indian appropriation bill was in conference there was a Senate amendment proposing this legislation, and I take some pride in saying that I was largely responsible, for the elimination in conference of that provision. We now have it, however, about to become a law, having passed the House and Senate, and know that after September 1 the position of Commissioner of the Five Tribes will be filled by an appointment by the President, to be confirmed by the Senate, and the position of union agent will be discontinued. This will mean that we will have a political appointee in place of the two efficient men who have served in these positions for so many years without a suggestion of corruption, malfeasance, or neglect of duty, whatsoever.

Mr. Speaker, when this matter was discussed in the House when the Indian appropriation bill was under consideration, gentlemen on the other side argued that it was in the interest of economy. I want to call their attention and the attention of the House to the fact that there is nothing to be saved by this legislation, and this is proved by the fact that the appropriation for the administration of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes is increased by this bill several thousand dollars over what it was in 1913 and over what it was in 1912. The Indian appropriation act approved August 24, 1912, appropriated "for expenses of administration of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, Oklahoma, and the compensation of employees, $200,000." The act approved June 30, 1913, being for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, provides "for expenses of administration of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, Oklahoma, and the compensation of employees, including such attorneys as the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, employ in connection with probate matters affecting individual allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, $250,000."

It will be noted that the appropriation for the last fiscal year includes such attorneys as the Secretary of the Interior may employ in connection with probate matters. This bill, as agreed to in conference, appropriates for expenses of administration and the compensation of employees $175,000, and, in addition thereto, $85,000 for salaries and expenses of attorneys and other employees as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary in connection with probate matters. Therefore, there is appropriated in this bill for administration purposes $265,000, or $15,000 more than was appropriated for the last fiscal year, and $65,000 more than appropriated for the previous fiscal year for the same purposes.

So, Mr. Speaker, it is certain that nothing is to be saved by this consolidation of offices, but, on the contrary, it is going to cost more money than it has cost heretofore.

There is another portion of this bill, providing for the administration of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, that I do not indorse, although I am in favor of what is sought to be accomplished, and that is the provision that proposes an appropriation of $85,000 to enable the Secretary of the Interior to employ attorneys and other employees in connection with probate matters. I have heretofore strenuously advocated an appropriation to continue the employment of district agents, whose duty in part was to look after probate matters, and particularly with reference to the estates of minors. I favored such an appropriation against the opposition of my good friends from Oklahoma on the other side of the aisle. In connection with a discussion of this subject on a certain occasion it became necessary for me to present to the House charges that were very serious, and many now present will remember what I said in making public a report made by Mr. Mott, the national attorney for the Creek Nation, which showed a most deplorable condition in the different counties in that nation, demonstrating by the records of the county courts that it cost, on an average, to administer the estates of Indian minors about 20 per cent of the estate, as against about 3 or 4 per cent for administering the estates of white minors, this being about the average cost of administration throughout the United States. The gentlemen from Oklahoma on that side of the House denounced these charges as being false and without foundation, accused me of being sensational, and asserted that the courts of Oklahoma were competent to administer upon the estates of Indians without the interference of the Federal Government. I am very glad to know that these same gentlemen have apparently at last recognized that the charges as presented by the Mott report were true, which they now reluctantly admit, after having investigated them and after they were substantiated by an investigation made by the governor of Oklahoma, and after the present efficient Commissioner of Indian Affairs has declared publicly that the charges are true. And now our Oklahoma friends are supporting an appropriation of $85,000 to provide for the employment of attorneys, probate and others, to watch their county courts.

This is the only instance in American history where the Federal Government has been called upon to make an appropriation to protect the citizens of a State from being wronged by the courts of the State, and it would seem to me that the people of Oklahoma ought to see to it that their courts do justice at the expense of the State, without calling upon the Government to provide an appropriation to pay for having their courts watched to see that minors are not robbed of what belongs to them. The district agents were employed in supervising the affairs of the Indians generally, and incidentally they were required to look after their interests in probate matters. I presume they received salaries of $1,200 or $1,500 a year, and they held their positions under the classified service. This appropriation of $85,000 to employ attorneys, like the provision consolidating the offices of commissioner and union agent, is undoubtedly for a political purpose. There are now, I believe, 21 of these probate attorneys, each drawing a salary of $2,500 per year and expenses, and all being political appointees. I maintain that everything that is being done at present with reference to the administration of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma is with a view to political advantage and to create political jobs by doing away with those heretofore appointed through the classified service.

It will be remembered that when I made public in this House the report of Mr. Mott with reference to conditions in the Creek Nation the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DAVENPORT] assailed Mr. Mott, referred to him as a carpetbagger, and boasted that he would be driven out of the service and out of Oklahoma. Mr. Mott's contract expired in February of this year. The principal chief of the Creek Nation, a Democrat in politics, wished to retain Mr. Mott as the attorney of the nation, but, notwithstanding this fact and that he was commended by the present Secretary of the Interior as having been an honest and courageous official, his contract was not approved, due to the protest that was made by Democratic Members of Congress from Oklahoma and other Democratic politicians from that State. The man selected to succeed Mr. Mott, I am pleased to say, is a good lawyer and a man of high character, and I compliment the administration on having apparently selected a good man for the position, but, Mr. Speaker, I want to emphasize that the change was made for a political purpose and also for the purpose of punishing Mr. Mott for being responsible for the charges that were brought to the attention of the House with reference to conditions in the county courts of the Creek Nation in Oklahoma in relation to the estates of Indian minors.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that Judge Allen, who is now holding the position that Mr. Mott held, was elected as a judge by the citizens of his district and is one of the best judges in Oklahoma?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I can not say any more of Judge Allen than I have. It is true he was occupying the position of district judge in Oklahoma and resigned to take this position, and, as I have said, he is a gentleman, a man of high character, and, I believe, a good lawyer. I am not criticizing Judge Allen. I am simply pointing to the fact, Mr. Speaker, that politics will dominate in the Indian Service in Oklahoma from now on. I do not want to have this opportunity go by without calling attention to it. For a number of years we have had a commissioner to the Five Tribes and a union agent, who have efficiently administered the affairs of their offices in a manner that could not successfully be criticized or assailed, for during their entire administration there has never been a suggestion against the character, honesty, or the efficiency of these officials, but it is now proposed to eliminate them by the appointment of a politician by the President, and it can not be said, as I have already asserted, that it is in the interest of economy when this bill, as agreed to in conference, carries a larger appropriation than has been made heretofore for the administration of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, before I leave the subject of Mr. Mott, I want to bring to the attention of the House a circumstance that I think will be of interest at this time and to emphasize that what I have said is true that he was not permitted to continue as the attorney for the Creek Nation because of politics, he being a Republican, and for the purpose of punishing him for having honestly discharged his duty. Secretary Lane, in writing to the principal chief of the Creek Nation, Moty Tiger, referring to Mr. Mott, said:

> Mr. Mott is an honest man, an able man, and a courageous man.

The Secretary also addressed a letter to Mr. Mott after the matter of a contract had been made with another attorney, and Mr. Mott was authorized to make any use of it that he saw fit. The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 14, 1914.

M. L. MOTT, Esq.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MOTT: Chief Moty Tiger and myself have agreed upon Judge Allen as your successor as attorney for the Creek Nation. The reason for this change is set forth in my letter to the chief, a copy of which is inclosed.

I shall always take pleasure in contemplating the manner in which you conducted yourself during the inquiry here. That you have been honest under difficulties and fearless at all times in doing your duty seems to be admitted even by those to whom you have been most antipathetic.

I am glad to know that you are going to return to Oklahoma, and I trust that by mingling freely with those people they will come to see you as a man of ideals.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with relation to Mr. J. George Wright, the present Commissioner of the Five Tribes, I want to say a word. Anticipating that some of my good friends on the other side of the aisle, from Oklahoma, will probably rise and talk about the "horde of political employees" that are employed in his office, I want to make a very brief statement.

Mr. J. George Wright, the present Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes, has been in his position for many years, having been transferred from the position of inspector on July 1, 1907. His office has been inspected personally by different Secretaries of the Interior, by several of the Assistant Secretaries, and the Assistant Attorney General for the department, as well as other department representatives, and without exception his administration has been found entirely satisfactory, and there never has been during his entire service any suggestion of inefficiency or wrongdoing upon his part.

We have repeatedly heard it asserted on this floor and elsewhere that the office of the commissioner is filled with political appointees and a large force of useless employees are on the pay rolls. I have made a careful inquiry to ascertain definitely the number of employees employed in the office of the commissioner or under him, and whether or not there is any foundation for the suggestion that they are politicians appointed from many States other than Oklahoma, and positions distributed as political patronage to Senators and Congressmen, as has been so often asserted.

On July 1, 1907, when Mr. Wright assumed his office, there were 181 employees; 61 were Republicans, 47 Democrats, 56 women, 27 of whom were connected with families considered Democratic and 24 of Republican families. There were also 16 colored janitors or messengers.

Mr. Wright was instructed by the Secretary of the Interior to make no changes except in the interests of the service. From that time to the present not a single appointment to a position in that office has been made except from an eligible list furnished by the Civil Service Commission, with the exception of three temporary stenographers and a few temporary employees that were authorized by the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs and approved by the present Secretary of the Interior.

As the work has approached completion the force has been reduced, until at present only 50 persons are employed, all of whom, with the exception of the two or three recent temporary appointees just mentioned, were employed in 1907, and have been retained because they were considered the most efficient. Of those now connected with the office only 12 are Republicans, 17 are Democrats, 18 are women, 10 being from Democratic families and 8 from Republican, and there are three colored messengers.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion we find that a very efficient attorney, who has rendered able and valuable service to the Creek Nation, an attorney whom the nation desired to continue, has been let out and a Democrat appointed in his place, mostly because he is a Republican. We find that there have been positions heretofore in the classified service to quite a considerable number, known as district agents, probably drawing not more than $1,200 or $1,500 a year, that have been displaced by the appointment of attorneys drawing salaries of $2,500 a year and their expenses, the appointments being political. We find in this bill a provision to do away with the present commissioner and the union agent and put in his place a politician appointed upon the recommendation of our good friends from Oklahoma.

Mr. Speaker, I will leave it for the House to conclude what will follow after that change takes place. I might mention, in passing, that last year, after a similar provision was put in the Indian appropriation bill after it left this House, a bill was immediately introduced in another place which provided that all the moneys belonging to the Indians in Oklahoma should be withdrawn from the Treasury and deposited in the banks of Oklahoma under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, who would get his recommendations from the commissioner we now propose to appoint from Oklahoma.

When it is considered that there are many millions of dollars in the Treasury of the United States belonging to Indians in Oklahoma, it is apparent what it would mean if it could all be distributed throughout that State by placing it in banks selected by the commissioner, who will probably be named by those recognized by the administration in the distribution of political patronage. I would like to discuss this matter at greater length, but will not ask a further extension of time, in view of the desire on the part of the House to get this conference report out of the way in order to proceed with other business.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I shall not indulge in any political colloquy with my good friend from South Dakota. These questions pertaining to the Indian affairs ought to rise above politics. They ought to be considered wholly with reference to the Indian welfare. To make sure that I make no mistake in the record I will present, I want to say that the record which I hold in my hand is from the Indian Office, and it is signed by Mr. Hauke, who was under the preceding Republican administration and is now one of the assistant commissioners of the Indian Office. He is still in the Indian Office, and has been for many years in that office, so it must be authentic. I want to say on January 8, 1908, Theodore Roosevelt, then President of the United States, issued an Executive order placing 126 men in the civil service that had been prior thereto politically appointed and considered political appointees, and their names and salaries I have here, and I will put them in the RECORD.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Does the gentleman mean that the letter——

Mr. FERRIS. Just let me proceed for a moment. I desire to say on July 12, 1910, William Howard Taft, then President of the United States, issued an Executive order covering 40 appointees that had been made by the Republican State chairman, the Republican national committeemen, the Republican Delegates in Congress, and the Republicans who had been looking after their faithful. There can not be any doubt about the fact, and they went into the civil service under that order, and the names of the men and the salaries are in my hands, which I will place in the RECORD, so there can not be any doubt about that. On October 9, 1908, again Theodore Roosevelt issued an Executive order, a copy of which I hold in my hand, and the names and salaries I have, covering an aggregate of 129 in number into the classified service by Executive order. That is the record of the Republican Party in Oklahoma in building up conditions in Oklahoma. That is an example of their strict adherence to civil service.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Let me proceed; the Chairman desires me to get through as soon as possible, and I want to get through, and I do not desire to get in any long-winded, civil-service, political controversy about this affair. I only do it now to let the truth come into a situation that needs to be understood. I want to say to the gentleman who complains of this exact provision for the Five Civilized Tribes that we reduced the item from $250,000 of last year to $175,000 this year and got rid of a duplication that should have been abolished years ago.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, that is not fair. The gentleman does not want to make that statement.

Mr. FERRIS. I do want to make that statement.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then the gentleman is making a misstatement.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not do any such thing. The amount carried in the last Indian appropriation bill was $250,000. This is reduced to $175,000. There is no mistake about that. Figures can not lie. The gentleman can assail my integrity and the statement, but the bill speaks for itself. Now, let us proceed a little further. The gentleman says that this does not work economy, and says we do not get rid of any of the officers, and we do not do any good for the people of Oklahoma, and that it is a case of playing politics. If there ever has been a case in the country where politics ran at fever heat and politics knew no bounds, it has been the administration of the affairs of Oklahoma by the Republican Party. I do not wish to irritate anybody on the other side, but, Mr. Speaker, I am a Representative in Congress from Oklahoma. Oklahoma with her 117,000 Indians has been made the football of this House long enough. I do not say that there are no irregularities in Oklahoma; of course not. There are irregularities in Oklahoma; there is graft in places in Oklahoma, and probably always will be. There is no question about that. There is graft with the people of South Dakota. There is no doubt about that. There are in Minnesota, anywhere in the world, and in every State and in every country where we have a weak people and a strong people living side by side. There always will be irregularities and some graft. I have asserted before in this House, and I will assert it again now, that within our State there reside practically one-half of all the Indians of the United States; there are no more irregularities, there is no more graft, there is no more mistreatment of the Indians than there is in any other State in the Union, and I doubt if there is half as much. Now, another suggestion to this House: I had not intended to get into a general colloquy on this subject, but my heart runs over to hear our State assailed continuously with the same old speech every year, and it ought not to go unchallenged, and it shall not longer go unchallenged.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. May I have a couple of minutes more?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield two minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. FERRIS. In most of the States the Indians have no part in society; in most of the States the Indians have no voice, for they can not even vote. In our State each and every one is a full citizen and is entitled to vote and can do anything that any other citizen is entitled to do. It so happens that our governor is an Indian; our lieutenant governor is an Indian citizen; our legislature has a large contingent of Indian citizens, a per cent proportionate to our population of State officers are Indian citizens, one of our United States Senators is an Indian citizen and three of our House Members of Congress are Indian citizens. You see how badly treated the Indians are in our State. Oh, it is easy for a man who knows little of the facts to assert it is filled with graft and all sorts of trouble. I again repeat, we admit we have some graft, we do admit some trouble, we have taxation burdens that are heavy to bear, a State that is less than 7 years of age, with more than 50 per cent of its property off the tax rolls, but in our new State our load is almost more than we can bear, still we are assaulted. There are no greater wrongs there than in any other State with a like Indian population. If there is a single thing that can be suggested by any man here or elsewhere that will improve the condition I want to say I am for it. I never bought a town lot or an acre of Five Tribes Indian land in my life, and I do not own one now that ever belonged to the Five Civilized Tribes.

I can speak dispassionately about this. Much of this noise is politics; much of it is to hold jobs for people who ought to be discharged. Too much ill-advised loose talk occurs here and in the papers by politicians and faddists. If they want to really help the Indians, they ought to help secure the fulfillment of his treaties and assure him his rights.

I say that the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma—no Indian tribe has more money per capita—has as much intelligence per capita, has as much ability to play its part in society, as any Indian people in this country and as much as most white people of similar environments and training. To say that these people are dependent, depleted, and polluted is a lie on the lips of the man who utters it.

The Indian problem is everywhere where Indians are found. It is not alone in Oklahoma. I shall not try to say that there is no irregularity there, for there is, but it is not all in our State. [Applause.]

I will insert for the benefit of my Republican friends across the aisle the three Executive orders of their two Republican administrations, and let them know how these patriots got into the civil service.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, April 23, 1913.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In accordance with my letter of April 8, 1913, I am transmitting herewith copies of the Executive orders issued by ex-Presidents Roosevelt and Taft, affecting employees in the State of Oklahoma, and lists showing the names, positions, and salaries of persons classified thereunder.

Respectfully,

C. F. HAUKE, Acting Commissioner.

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

The 126 employees of the Union Agency, of which a list has been furnished the Civil Service Commission by the Secretary of the Interior, and who are carried in the agents' accounts as irregular labor outside the classified service, may be continued without examination under the civil-service rules as a temporary expedient, in view of the impossibility of dispensing with or changing the present force. No addition shall, however, be made to the force, except in accordance with the civil-service rules; nor shall the present employees be transferred to positions outside of that agency.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

Those persons who were employed on June 30, 1910, or within the year preceding, as district agents and assistant district agents (local representatives of the Secretary of the Interior in Oklahoma) and who are certified by the Secretary of the Interior as competent and efficient may be retained, but shall not by such retention obtain a competitive status; and all vacancies which may occur in said positions shall be filled by the transfer of persons properly serving in the Indian Service under the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes or in the Union Agency.

It was at first thought that the demand for the services of these employees would be temporary, but when it was found that the work would be likely to continue for several years it was deemed advisable by the Interior Department and the Civil Service Commission to make provision for the retention of those employees' services who have been found competent and efficient and to provide for filling future vacancies by transfer.

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

Prior to February 12, 1908, various places in the executive civil service were filled without compliance with the requirements of the civil-service act and rules, because the appointing officers were of the opinion that the terms of an appropriation act or some circumstance implied exception from such requirements. On February 12, 1908, the Attorney General rendered an opinion holding in effect that all places in the executive civil service except those mentioned in Schedule A of the rules and except persons employed merely as laborers and persons whose appointments are subject to confirmation by the Senate, must be filed as a result of open competitive examinations held under the provisions of the law, and that Congress in the exemption of any position or class of positions from the operation of the civil-service act must use language indicating clearly and affirmatively its intention that the civil-service rules should not be applied.

Persons whose names are reported to the Civil Service Commission in response to this opinion and who are occupying places whose duties are similar to those of competitive positions may be classified upon approval by the commission, but may be transferred only when in the opinion of the Civil Service Commission such transfer is required in the interest of the service, and then only after an appropriate examination by said commission. Vacancies shall be filled in accordance with the civil-service act and rules. If said commission finds that any of these places can not be satisfactorily subjected to competitive tests they may be treated as excepted from examination and their occupants shall not acquire a competitive status.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to enter into any political discussion, but my colleague from Oklahoma has presented some figures of which I was not aware. But I do know something of the facts in respect to whether politics has entered into the Government control of the Indian affairs in Oklahoma in the last 12 years during my service in this House. I want to say that the Republican chairmen of the State of Oklahoma at no time have requested the President of the United States, either Mr. Taft or Mr. Roosevelt, to cover into the civil service by special order a single individual. And I take it that those names that the gentleman has presented—and I am not criticizing him, as he has the order—were covered into the service at the request of the Civil Service Commission, or rather, Mr. Wright, at the head of the Dawes Commission. And I want to say this: That I have made investigation a number of times, because I have been in politics in that State, as to the political complexion of those employed by the Dawes Commission. And there has never been a minute or a day in the last 12 years when a large majority of those people were not Democrats. Some years ago there was a bill passed creating special agents down there. We had a right under the bill to make those places political. I went to Mr. Wright and requested one person only of the number to be appointed, and I finally had to appeal to the President of the United States before I could get one man appointed as a district agent. And when they were through appointing, what was the personnel of the appointments, all of whom could have been appointed by reason of their political convictions? When they were through appointing them it was found that a large number of them were appointed by Mr. Wright from the civil-service employees at that time employed by the Dawes Commission.

There never has been a time in that State when there were not as many Indian superintendents who were Democrats as there were those who were Republicans. I have made no complaint, but I say here and now that when it is charged at the doors of my party and my State that we have controlled the Indian Service in that State, and the Territory, when it was a Territory, or that it was controlled by the Republicans or the Republican Party, it is an unjust accusation, because it is just about as completely under the influence of the civil service and civil-service domination as you can ever hope to have the civil service dominate anything in this country.

Recently another bill was passed, as mentioned by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE]. I do not blame my good friends from Oklahoma, if they can get the jobs, and I want to tell you there are about as many boys that have jobs in that State as in any State in the Union; more officials, in my judgment, in my State, in proportion to the population, than in any other State in the Union. But under the recent provision, I say, the attorneys, whose duty it is to consult with the probate judges, to my knowledge are appointed from the most active politicians in that State. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] want?

Mr. MANN. Five minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I will move the previous question.

Mr. MANN. I may want a little more time. I wish to make an inquiry. There are three amendments in dispute that relate to the irrigation of Indian lands, and which I suppose will go back to the conference on the motion made to disagree. One of them is as to the Flathead Reservation, where we have provided for the reimbursement of the expenditures which we make out of the sale of the surplus land and the timber sold. Amendments 81 and 82 relate to that matter. So I want to ascertain, if I can, from somebody something about this expenditure. There are a number of these items in the bill where we advance the money to be reimbursed out of the Indian funds, and we pay the interest. Is that the way it goes? It is at our expense that we furnish the money, is it?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is a trust fund, as I understand, in the hands of the United States for the purpose——

Mr. MANN. This is not any trust fund. This is a fund appropriated out of the Federal Treasury, with the provision that it shall be reimbursed when the Indians have funds to their credit.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. You then speak of the reimburseable items. These two are the reimbursable items. As I understand it, these Indians all have property to be sold.

Mr. MANN. Here is what I want to get at: I will put a specific case. On the Flathead Indian Reservation there is an irrigation project which, I think, is to cost six or eight million dollars before it is finished. We have been advancing the money in small amounts, to be reimbursed out of the sale of the lands. Meanwhile, as the irrigation project proceeds, we sell the surplus land to people who get on there and cultivate it under the irrigation project. Those people pay back the money in the course of 20 years' time. If there is any fund belonging to the Indians, that is to be paid into the Treasury of the United States and reimburse the money that we have advanced. That may be before the 20 years have expired. Now, as the settlers only pay back their full amount in 20 years, and pay no interest upon it, the Indians will be out the interest for the use of their funds for a number of years. Who is going to pay that? If they have funds in the Treasury which are not used to reimburse advances, they draw interest upon them. It looks to me—and I ask for information—as though in our generosity we were advancing a large sum of money in this case, and large sums in other cases, in order to provide irrigation projects where we sell the lands to our white brothers, payable back in 20 years' time, and do it at the expense of the Indians.

We do not pay them any interest. As soon as they have any money we transfer it to our own account, and they are out the interest until the money is paid back into the fund.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to say to the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes; certainly; I yield to anybody who has information on this subject.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to say to the gentleman that I do not think he has the correct conception——

Mr. MANN. Well, pass that by, and give me information——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. With reference to these Indian irrigation projects. I want to call the gentleman's attention to a fact that may have escaped his notice, and that is that no new Indian reclamation project has been commenced within the last few years. The projects referred to in this bill were all begun several years ago.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken about that; but we will pass that by, too.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, as to the situation on the Flathead Indian Reservation, here was a tribe of Indians on a reservation, roaming over the country, being supported mostly by the Government, and their lands not doing them any good. A law was passed by Congress—whether it was passed as the result of an agreement or not I do not remember—by which the Indians on that reservation were to be allotted, each receiving a certain amount of land. That did not do the Indian any good. He could not do anything with his land after it was allotted to him, so the law provided that the surplus lands should be opened to settlement under the homestead laws and the price of the land was to be fixed by appraisement. Then it was provided that the proceeds received from the sale of the land should be used for the purpose of constructing a reclamation project and furnishing water to the homesteaders and to the Indians, thereby making it possible for those people, Indians and whites, to exist.

Mr. MANN. Was that in the original law?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes, sir. Now the homesteader pays, as I recall, upon this reservation $7 an acre for the lands as a price that goes to the Indian.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move the previous question.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman should not do that. I desire to have at least five minutes more.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then at the end of that time I will serve notice on the House that I will move the previous question.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have a little time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The homesteader has to sign up and he has to pay the reclamation charge, in addition to the $7 an acre that goes to the Indian. The United States in the first instance advances the money. Then it is expected that as the homesteader pays for the surplus land and from the sale of the timber, for which there has been no market and never will be until we develop the country, the cost of the reclamation project will be reimbursed to the Government.

The loser in the transaction, in my judgment, is the United States, not the Indian. He does not part with anything. He is getting his land irrigated. He is getting his allotments made extremely valuable, not only so that he can support himself thereupon, but adding to the value so that lands that were worth $7 an acre will be worth from $100 to $150 an acre, and if the project works out as it is hoped it will the money will all be returned to the Indian, and he will have the benefit of the reclamation. It may be that for a certain time the United States will have considerable money in this project without any interest.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire who has the floor?

Mr. MANN. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that a parliamentary inquiry is not in order. The gentleman from Connecticut can not take me off the floor by a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is correct.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I say, it may be that for a certain time the United States will have money in this project without any interest; but let me say to the gentleman that not in this generation and possibly not in the next would there be any money for anybody if there had not been legislation providing for the sale of the surplus land and the timber and providing for the construction of a reclamation project.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from South Dakota usually gives information, but in this case he has not given me any information. I knew all that he has stated, because I have looked it up, and it is a matter of record. But the gentleman has not yet told who will pay the interest on this sum while the Indians are out of its use. When the Indian land is sold there is taken out of their fund and reimbursed to the Treasury the amount of money which the Government of the United States has advanced, but the settlers have not yet paid in that money as a part of the construction charge, so that the Indians are out of the use of that money, and they lose the interest on it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman, from Illinois will permit, there is not any money until the purchaser and the settler pays it in.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken about that. Of course they pay in some money, but the settler pays for the land, and where the Government sells timber the timber money is also paid into the Treasury. That is used to reimburse the Treasury, but the settler has not yet paid in the construction charge in full and will not for years, and meanwhile the settler gets the benefit of the interest on the Indians' money. Now that is very generous treatment on our part, but is it quite fair to the Indian?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman, if he will permit me to interrupt him, that the United States will have to finance this proposition and will have to advance all of the money, and it will be years before it will be reimbursed. Therefore the Indian will never lose much, if anything, on account of interest.

Mr. MANN. Oh, as soon as the land is sold that sum will be taken to reimburse the United States Treasury to the extent that it will go, both from the sale of the land, from the sale of the timber, and from the payments that are made on the construction charge, but meanwhile the settler is getting the benefit of the money advanced by the Government and then reimbursed by the Indians and getting it at the expense, first, of the United States and, second, at the expense of the Indian Office. Now, I do not know whether that is the proper thing to do or not. I have been trying to find out what are the facts.

Mr. MILLER. If the United States advances the money, in the first place, the Indian paying no interest thereon, and it is repaid only as the funds come in and the settlers pay for it, how on earth is a penny of the Indian's money out at interest?

Mr. MANN. It is so simple that the gentleman will get it in a moment.

Mr. MILLER. No; I have been thinking of it for a long time.

Mr. MANN. When land is sold, the settler pays for the land. That is one thing. He pays for the construction charge of the irrigation project. That is another thing. The two are kept separate, and he pays for them separately. Now, there is no question about interest with respect to the land. The land is sold for so much an acre, payable at such and such a time, and as the money comes in from the sale of the land it is used to reimburse the United States for its advances for the construction charges, and on so much of the money as is used for this purpose the Indians lose the interest until the construction charge is repaid by the settlers, which is not until a series of years. The gentleman can not take a piece of paper and pencil and figure it any other way.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman will permit——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs if he will yield to me a minute before he moves the previous question?

Mr. STEPHENS Texas. The previous question has already been moved.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is the motion of the gentleman from Texas to further insist to the disagreement of the House to the amendment of the Senate?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Does that include amendment No. 82?

The SPEAKER. It includes all of them.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If I am not mistaken, the message which came over from the Senate announced that the Senate had receded from its amendment No. 82.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I will modify my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas modifies his motion so as to leave out amendment No. 82. Now, does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN]?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I withhold my motion for a moment.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, in the minute which is yielded to me I am going to ask unanimous consent that whenever the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] or the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] sees fit to inject remarks, they may be allowed to do so, notwithstanding the rules to the contrary.

The SPEAKER. That is an improper request.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has just said that the request is an improper one.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that the gentleman from Connecticut has no right under the rules of the House constantly to jump up and make statements of that sort, reflecting upon other Members of the House unfairly and untruthfully, and have them go into the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is out of order——

Mr. MANN. No; I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. What point of order does the gentleman make?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not have such matter go into the RECORD. It is the duty of the Speaker to order the reporters to omit it.

The SPEAKER. The rule about that is this: Of course the Chair can not tell when a Member gets up what his intention is, but after the Chair has ruled that a Member is out of order, then if he persists in talking, the Chair can have his subsequent remarks stricken out. He can not do so until he has ruled on it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think the rule is very clear that if one gentleman objects to the remarks of another on the floor it is his business to ask that the remarks be taken down.

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If they are not taken down there is nothing out of order.

The SPEAKER. Of course, that has to be done.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have already moved the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. This vote is to be taken on all the remaining amendments except No. 82.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. All except No. 82.

The SPEAKER. That is omitted because it has been receded from by the Senate. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas that the House further insist on its disagreement to the remaining amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Now I move that the House agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House agree to the further conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Speaker announced the conferees on the part of the House, Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. BURKE of South Dakota.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BAILEY, for three days, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering District of Columbia legislation.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the resolution which was laid aside.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] moves to go into Committee of the Whole to consider District of Columbia business, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] calls up the report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that when this conference report came up the House was considering the resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair is stating.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FUR SEALS IN THE PRIBILOF ISLANDS.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit the views of the minority of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce on the fur-seal investigation in the Pribilof Islands. (H. Rept. 500, pt. 2.)

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does that carry with it any right of discussion?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. MANN. Simply to file the views of the minority.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman will be allowed to file the minority views.

There was no objection.

MANAGERS OF HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

The SPEAKER. Before the beginning of the consideration of the conference report on the Indian bill the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] got recognition for his report from the Committee on Rules, and then suspended operations to let the conference report on the Indian bill come in. The resolution from the Committee on Rules has precedence over the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]. The Clerk will report the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 581.

Resolved, That immediately after the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to consider House joint resolution 241; that there shall be not exceeding one hour general debate on the resolution, to be equally divided between those supporting and those opposing the resolution. At the conclusion of such general debate the resolution may be read for amendment, and after consideration of the amendments thereto the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and amendments to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask for a vote on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution reported from the Committee on Rules.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 241) for the appointment of four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Resolved, etc., That James Steele Catherwood, of Illinois; John C. Nelson, of Indiana; Frederick J. Close, of Kansas; and Thomas S. Bridgham, of Maine, be, and they are hereby, appointed members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers of the United States, to succeed Oscar M. Gottshall, of Ohio; William Warner, of Missouri; Franklin Murphy, of New Jersey, whose terms of office expired April 21, 1912, and James Barry, whose resignation as a member of the said board has been accepted.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

On page 1, lines 3 and 4, strike out the words "John C. Nelson, of Indiana," and insert "George H. Wood, of Ohio."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the name "Gottshall," in line 8, is spelled wrong. If you fire a man out of office, you ought at least to spell his name right.

Mr. HAY. How should it be spelled?

Mr. MANN. G-o-t-t-s-c-h-a-l-l.

Mr. HAY. I ask that the correction be made.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert a letter "c" after the letter "s" in the word "Gottshall," in line 8.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'HAIR. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out in line 1, page 2, the name "James" and insert "Patrick H."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, strike out the word "James" and insert "Patrick H."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'HAIR. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, after the word "accepted" insert the words "Provided, That four members of said board shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business at any regular or special meeting thereof."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, is this amendment designed to provide what is now the situation that makes it so urgent to bring in a rule for the passage of the bill?

Mr. O'HAIR. Mr. Speaker, the law as it now stands provides that a quorum shall consist of seven members. The law provides that the number of members shall be reduced by virtue of the expiration of the term of office, death, resignation, and so forth, until there are only five left. There are only two left whose terms have not expired and three whose terms have expired but who are holding over until their successors are appointed. There are only five members of the board to-day.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Can not they provide a quorum by meeting with the ex officio members in Washington?

Mr. O'HAIR. I presume they might, if they could get the ex officio members to meet with them. The time will come when there will be only five members—in about a year from now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is not this being hurried through here so that they can enjoy a quorum at a meeting up in Maine instead of in Washington?

Mr. O'HAIR. This is cutting a quorum from seven to four. The number has been reduced from 11 to 5.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not object to the amendment.

Mr. O'HAIR. The number of the board was formerly 11 and a quorum was 7.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield, as I understand, the President of the United States is one of the ex officio members of the board?

Mr. O'HAIR. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It is hardly expected that by legislation you would require the President of the United States to meet with this board for the purpose of making a quorum. That would be absurdity run wild

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Why is it so provided?

Mr. MANN. It is not so provided.

Mr. O'HAIR. He is an ex officio member under the law. But the ex officio members can not be required to attend, anyway.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. How many men were originally on the board?

Mr. O'HAIR. Originally there were 9. That was in 1865. In 1867 the number was increased to 10 and in 1880 it was increased to 11. That does not count the 3 ex officio members. Under the present law it is cut to 5 members. A quorum has always been 7 members.

Mr. MURDOCK. There are now five members of the board actually serving?

Mr. O'HAIR. Yes; counting three whose terms expired in 1912 and who are holding over.

Mr. MURDOCK. This resolution proposes to substitute new appointees for those who are holding over?

Mr. O'HAIR. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. For how many?

Mr. O'HAIR. Four.

Mr. MURDOCK. That will leave only one hold over.

Mr. O'HAIR. There would be four holding over, but one resigned a year or so ago. There is one to fill his place and the other three are to fill the places of the three hold overs.

Mr. MURDOCK. After we have the new board completed, when do the terms of the members expire?

Mr. O'HAIR. Under the law they are appointed for six years, or until their successors are chosen. That is the organic law that created the board.

Mr. MURDOCK. The expiration of the terms of the new appointees will come at the same time?

Mr. O'HAIR. Yes.

Mr. HAY. Except the one elected to the place of the one that resigned, and his term expires in two years.

Mr. O'HAIR. There are two whose terms expire in 1816, and when their terms expire there will only be one appointed, because that will make the number five.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I would like to inquire if this resolution and amendment contemplate filling a vacancy on the board which occurred three or four weeks ago by the recent death of a member?

Mr. O'HAIR. No, sir.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Did the death of that member create a vacancy?

Mr. O'HAIR. Under the law as enacted a year ago, there being 11 members, it provided that as vacancies occurred through expiration of terms of office, resignation, death, or from any other cause, until the number was reduced to 5, there should be no more appointments.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. At the time of the death of the last member, three or four weeks ago, how many active members were on the board?

Mr. O'HAIR. Six.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. And his death reduced it to five. There would have been seven, but one man resigned 18 months ago, and his place is to be filled. And there are now six.

Then there are three other members of the board whose terms expired in April, 1912, and under this law their places had to be filled.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Now, if the gentleman will yield for another question, did not the law or the rider attached to an appropriation in 1912 or 1913 provide that the membership should be reduced by reason of vacancies existing by death or resignation to five members? Now, if the gentleman's resolution passes, how many members will there be on the board?

Mr. O'HAIR. There will be six. There would be seven if that man had not died. He would have held until his time was out.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Then the purpose of the resolution is to increase the membership?

Mr. O'HAIR. No, sir. These named men take the places of those whom the law provides shall have their vacancies filled.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. But the law says the membership shall be reduced through vacancies to five members.

Mr. O'HAIR. This law was passed about April, May, or June, 1913, and provides:

Hereafter vacancies occurring in the membership of the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers shall not be filled until the whole number of members of said board is reduced to five and thereafter the number of members constituting said board shall not exceed five.

These vacancies exist by reason of vacancies and expirations of terms of office before this law was passed, and all vacancies that occurred after the passage of that law will not be filled until the number is reduced to five.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. O'HAIR. Certainly.

Mr. CLINE. I desire to ask a question in reference to the change in the original personality of these appointees. I see an Indiana man was selected in the original list of appointees.

Mr. O'HAIR. In the original resolution; yes.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I can answer, perhaps, better than the gentleman from Illinois. I prepared the original resolution and introduced the resolution, and when it was considered by the Committee on Military Affairs that committee struck out the name I had put in and put in another name.

Mr. CLINE. On what authority?

Mr. HAY. On the authority that the committee had the right to make any change in it it saw fit.

Mr. CLINE. I suppose there must have been some good reason for taking the name off.

Mr. HAY. The committee considered the matter and thought it was right to strike out the name of Mr. Nelson and insert the name of Mr. Wood, just like the committee could make any other amendment.

Mr. O'HAIR. I can further state the argument before the committee. There is one in Kansas, one in Illinois, one in Ohio, and one in Maine. Now, there are homes in Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, and we thought it would be better geographically to distribute these men around.

Mr. CLINE. That is the reason I am making inquiry. We have an old soliders' home at Marion.

Mr. O'HAIR. Also one at Dayton; and your home would be half way between——

Mr. CLINE. What salary do they get?

Mr. O'HAIR. Nothing.

Mr. CLINE. They have their expenses paid. I wanted to know how Indiana came to be left out.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. I want to ask if the gentleman from Illinois is in possession of the floor?

The SPEAKER. No; he is not in possession of the floor.

Mr. DONOVAN. I want to make an observation.

The SPEAKER. About what?

Mr. DONOVAN. The disorderly proceeding, led by the gentleman from Illinois, the minority leader——

The SPEAKER. That is out of order. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HAIR].

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. A good many Members do not seem to understand how to get at a Member when he is making invidious remarks. The Chair will state it over again. Whenever any gentleman says anything that any other gentleman thinks is in contravention of the rules, the proper thing to do is to ask that his words be taken down. That is the technical proceeding, and then harness him up and let the House determine what it is going to do about it; but for gentlemen to jaw backward and forward and accuse each other of intemperate remarks, with the thermometer 100 in the shade, does not contribute to the order of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17824) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes, No. 158, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes by the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. BRYAN, and Mr. GALLINGER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

REGULATION OF COTTON FUTURES.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Chair to lay before the House the conference report on the bill S. 110.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina calls up the conference report on the bill S. 110. The Clerk will read the report.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object. The report is not long, and I think it ought to be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the Clerk will read the report.

The conference report was read, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1012).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 110) to regulate trading in cotton futures and provide for the standardization of "upland" and "gulf" cottons separately, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same amended as follows:

In section 3, line 4, of the amendment strike out "1 cent" and insert in lieu thereof "2 cents."

In section 5, seventh line of fifth page, of the amendment, after the comma following "thereof," strike out all the rest of the paragraph and in lieu thereof insert the following: "fixed, assessed, collected and paid, in such manner and in accordance with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture."

In section 5, twenty-second line on the fifth page of the amendment, after "heard," insert the following: "by him or such officer, officers, agent, or agents of the Department of Agriculture as he may designate."

In section 9 of the amendment strike out the sentence beginning "That," in line 10 of page 8, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, from time to time, to establish and promulgate standards of cotton by which its quality or value may be judged or determined, including its grade, length of staple, strength of staple, color, and such other qualities, properties, and conditions as may be standardized in practical form, which, for the purposes of this act, shall be known as the 'Official cotton standards of the United States,' and to adopt, change, or replace the standard for any grade of cotton established under the act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909 (35 Stat. L., 251), and acts supplementary thereto: Provided, That any standard of any cotton established and promulgated under this act by the Secretary of Agriculture shall not be changed or replaced within a period less than one year from and after the date of the promulgation thereof by the Secretary of Agriculture: Provided further, That, subsequent to six months after the date section 3 of this act becomes effective, no change or replacement of any standard of any cotton established and promulgated under this act by the Secretary of Agriculture shall become effective until after one year's public notice thereof, which notice shall specify the date when the same is to become effective."

At the end of section 10 of the amendment insert a new paragraph as follows:

"This section shall not be construed to apply to any contract of sale made in compliance with section 5 of this act."

In section 11, line 8, of the amendment strike out "1 cent" and insert in lieu thereof "2 cents."

In section 11, first line on page 11, of the amendment strike out "quality" and insert in lieu thereof "quantity."

In section 20, line 9, of the amendment strike out "and" preceding "to."

In section 20, line 10, of the amendment strike out "permanent."

In section 20, line 12, strike out "and he shall" and insert in lieu thereof "to."

In section 20, line 13, of the amendment strike out "including" and insert in lieu thereof "to pay."

In section 20, line 13, of the amendment strike out "the employment of" and insert in lieu thereof "to employ."

In section 20, line 15, of the amendment, after the period, insert the following:

"The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to publish from time to time the results of investigations made in pursuance of this act."

In section 21, line 5, of the amendment strike out "three" and in lieu thereof insert "six."

In section 21, line 6, of the amendment strike out the period and insert: ": Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to any contract of sale of any cotton for future delivery mentioned in section 3 of this act which shall have been made prior to the date when section 3 becomes effective"; and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the title and agree to the same.

A. F. LEVER,
GORDON LEE,
G. N. HAUGEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

HOKE SMITH,
MORRIS SHEPPARD,
JAMES H. BRADY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 110) to regulate trading in cotton futures and provide for the standardization of "upland" and "gulf" cottons separately, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to the amendment of the House:

The conference amendment to section 3 of the House amendment changes the rate of taxation from 1 cent a pound to 2 cents a pound.

The conference amendments to section 5 of the House amendment state more explicitly the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to settle disputes under the seventh subdivision of that section.

The conference amendment to section 9 of the House amendment authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and promulgate standards of cotton from time to time and to make changes in such standards subject to two conditions, namely, first, that every standard established and promulgated must remain in force at least one year and, second, that, after the act has been in effect six months, no change of standards shall be made without at least one year's advance notice thereof.

The conference amendment to section 10 of the House amendment is a declaratory provision that section 10 shall not apply to contracts made in compliance with section 5.

The conference amendments to section 11 of the House amendment change the rate of tax on orders transmitted to foreign countries from 1 cent a pound to 2 cents a pound and correct a typographical error in the use of "quality" for "quantity."

Conference amendments to section 20 of the House amendments clarify the meaning by rearranging the grammatical construction and making clearly mandatory the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to publish the results of investigations made pursuant to the act and, in order to conform section 20 to the change made in section 9, strike out "permanent" before the phrase "standards of cotton."

The first conference amendment to section 21 of the House amendment extends the time of going into effect of the regulatory provisions of the act from three to six months. This is in order to give the Department of Agriculture the time which it estimates will be necessary to enable it to promulgate standards under section 9 and to adopt the essential rules and regulations provided for in the act. No shorter period would be sufficient to enable the cotton industry to prepare to conduct its future business under the statute without unduly depressing the price of cotton by reason of the far-reaching changes necessitated by this legislation.

The second conference amendment to section 21 of the House amendment is a declaratory provision that the act shall not apply to contracts made prior to the taxing section of the statute becoming effective.

The title is amended so as more accurately to cover the provisions of the act.

A. F. LEVER,
GORDON LEE,
G. N. HAUGEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire to address the Chair?

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to get some time from the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. LEVER. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MURDOCK. I want five minutes.

Mr. LEVER. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask for two or three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina yields to the gentleman from Kansas five minutes and the gentleman from Washington three minutes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I would like, if possible, to move the previous question at the end of 15 minutes debate and have a vote. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is very anxious to get on with his District bill this afternoon, although I will not unduly limit debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina gives notice that at the end of 15 minutes he will move the previous question.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I have been withholding here on the theory I would expedite matters by letting this arrangement for time be made. However, Mr. Speaker, I will now speed along. There is more dynamite politically wrapped up in this proposition for the Democratic side of this House than in any other proposition before the House in this Congress, and I am making the prediction now that if this measure becomes a law, and it probably will, that it will retire more men in the Democratic primaries in the South in 1916 than any other one thing this Congress or the next Congress will do. The previous question is to be moved after 15 minutes' debate on this measure. We spent over an hour at the time of the passage of the tariff bill on this same proposition, and on a subsequent occasion we spent another hour debating it.

Now, Congress having finally reached the point of giving the measure final form, we are to have 15 minutes of debate.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly, but I have only five minutes.

Mr. GARNER. Well, before the gentleman leaves that particular point that he started out on I would like him to give some reason why it is going to defeat so many gentlemen from the South.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is just exactly what I am going to explain.

This measure does not prohibit gambling in cotton futures, and the cotton raisers of the South, I will say to the gentleman from Texas, have been attempting for 20 years to suppress gambling in cotton futures. This measure legalizes such gambling, and the people of the South who have been praying for all these years for remedial legislation, who are given a stone when they have been asking for bread, will attend to the Democratic Members of this House who vote for it. I take it that this is an administration measure. I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER]. Is this an administration measure? Is it a measure that the administration stands for?

Mr. LEVER. This bill is indorsed by the Secretary of Agriculture very heartily. I do not know what the position of the President of the United States on this proposition is, except this: That a year ago, when the Underwood amendment was offered here to the tariff bill, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] stated that that amendment had been handed to him by the President of the United States. That amendment was almost on all fours with the present bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is what I wanted. I thank the gentleman from South Carolina. It is, then, virtually an administration measure.

Now, the farmers of the South, the cotton raisers, know what they want, and they have been attempting to get what they want for these 20 years; and what they want is a prohibition of gambling in cotton futures that will prohibit, and the best plan proposed is through a prohibition of the use of the mails to the transactions of the cotton exchanges. There are millions of men and women down South who are engaged in the business of raising cotton. There is a leisurely coterie of rich men over in New York who gamble in cotton. Every expert who has examined this question in the last 20 years says that the gambling in cotton futures on the cotton exchanges does bearishly affect the price of spot cotton as received by the producer. And yet when the evil cries out here for correction, men of the South, who must know the needs of the South, men who represent the people of the South, bring before Congress this sort of a measure, which does what? It fixes standards of cotton which, I understand, practically all the cotton exchanges in the last three years have adopted without any law. It does not suppress gambling. I said that the farmer down South knows what he wants, and he does. The Farmers' Union of this country passed recently a resolution. Part of that resolution reads as follows:

Gambling in cotton and other farm products is a vicious, immoral evil that has been fully investigated and reported upon by congressional committees and executive branches of the Federal Government as well as testified to time and again before our national lawmakers.

Now, I call the attention of the Democratic Members from the South, particularly to this paragraph:

Such gambling in farm products threatens the very foundation of our financial and business and commercial prosperity, and should be abolished, not licensed or legalized by an internal-revenue duty short of one that would actually destroy.

Now, the excise-tax proposition which is incorporated in this bill will not stop gambling in cotton futures. A prohibition of the use of the mail would. The Republicans not so many years ago passed a bill, through the House at least, which would have prohibited this practice. And there was not a single Republican at that time, as I remember it, from the South.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like one more minute.

Mr. LEVER. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. MURDOCK. This Congress is dominated by men from the South. Most of the chairmen of important committees are men from the South, men who have been sent here for years by southern constituencies, constituencies that have been asking for legislation that would reach this sore spot. In this legislation you are refusing them relief. What will be the result? The bill, like a good many other laws enacted here, will pass this year in the campaign successfully as an efficient measure. But in the campaign, or primary campaigns, in the South in 1916, after the law shall have been tried out, after it shall have been in effect for two years and has shown that it has not prohibited gambling, it will bring down upon the heads of the Democrats who vote for it condemnation, and it will bring that condemnation down upon them justly. Why, I ask, in heaven's name, when you Democrats from the South have a chance to correct one of the greatest evils in this country, why do you not do it? What holds you back? What prevents you? Why give to your constituents, when they ask for a real remedy, a sham remedy?

There is no cotton raised in my district. My district is not affected, so far as this bill is concerned, save as it is part of one of the States of the Union. But the people down South who have asked for this remedy and relief and who have a right to expect it are being fooled and shammed. And I say to you that this bill, if I can help it, will not pass the House without a roll call, and every man who votes for it will answer to his constituency, if not this year, then in 1916.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. LEVER. I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I have a letter signed by Charles S. Barrett, editor, apparently, of the National Field, and addressed to a southern Congressman who asked Mr. Barrett's opinion of this bill. Mr. Barrett, in a published reply, said:

This bill is a subterfuge.

He said:

There is not a line in the Lever bill to protect the farmer against fraudulent grading.

A little later this letter says:

There is no such thing as a legitimate future contract that is subject to settlement by a forfeiture of margins.

I will not read the whole of Mr. Barrett's letter now, but, with permission, will place it in the RECORD.

As I understand it, this bill has been amended so as to provide a 2 per cent tax instead of a 1 per cent tax—apparently still a subterfuge, if Mr. Barrett's premises are correct.

It seems that the southern cotton growers have been promised up and down that gambling in cotton shall stop. That seems to have been a platform promise, which must have echoed from every southern stump. Now, the point in the whole matter that particularly interests me, is why so much speed and so much hurry on this, when so many other Democratic platform promises have been permitted to go to seed. Why such hurry, this hot afternoon, on this cotton bill when the immigration restriction bill, which occupied so many strenuous and bitter hours on this floor last winter, and which was passed by the House, still sleeps in a Senate committee. Why? What has happened to it?

And the promised rural-credits bill. Where is it? What has happened? It was promised. Where is it? Nothing is heard of the good-roads proposition, except letters from all over the United States to Congressmen asking when and why and how they are going to get that legislation. Why is this? And why, here on this hot afternoon, shall we talk back and forth and hustle for the passage of a cotton bill which is said to be a subterfuge?

I add the letter from Charles S. Barrett, which is in the form of a signed editorial in the National Field, official organ of the Farmers' Union:

A SOUTHERN CONGRESSMAN ASKED BARRETT'S OPINION ON THE LEVER BILL; HE GOT IT.

DEAR SIR: I appreciate the fact that you ask for my opinion on the cotton-future bill, but we see it so differently that I fear you will not appreciate my views.

Perhaps I can best get the points by simply asking you a few questions.

Do you really believe that 75 per cent of the gambling done on those New York exchanges is done by the citizens of the State?

What do you mean by cotton of an "illegitimate character"?

Is not one grade of cotton just as legitimate as any other grade of cotton at some price?

Why discriminate between the grades that may be used to speculate on?

I know the excuse offered—that it will prevent unspinnable grades from being offered buyers to keep the buyers from demanding the delivery.

If you allow nine grades, is not that enough latitude to keep the merry game going?

You say it will save the farmers $50,000 a year. How? There is not a line in the Lever bill to protect the farmer against fraudulent grading by the buyer. I challenge you to show it. The protection is for the spinner, who is often "frisked" by grafting exporters.

Why does the bill not require the state of the grade when the contract is sold? Why require it only six days before delivery?

How will it affect the "scalper"?

I claim that there is no such thing as a legitimate future contract that is subject to settlement by a forfeiture of margins.

No; there is no getting together on this subterfuge.

You are headed one way and I another.

Stand up boldly and defend the thing as it is; don't straddle.

Why not amend the Senate bill by substituting the Scott bill for the Senate bill after the enacting clause and throw it in conference? If this Lever bill passes, you know it will not pass the Senate this session. The whole situation looks "punk" to me.

We may be wrong on this issue, but I shall not advocate the Government legalizing gambling and going in partnership for part of the swill. You say it is a prohibitory tax—then why not make it higher?

I have no compromise to offer.

Yours, very truly,

CHAS. S. BARRETT.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, when this bill passed the House, on June 29, under a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill I opposed its passage and gave my reasons for opposing it in the following words:

"Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who has just taken his seat, says that he is opposed to this bill. If the gentleman is sincere in that, and I know he is, then he should vote down this motion to suspend the rules, so we can amend it. Every good thing in this bill can be retained, and the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture knows it. Vote down this motion and let the bill be considered in the usual way, so it can be amended. It will remain on the calendar and can be acted on later in the usual way, and then we can keep everything that is good in it and put some additional things in it that are better than anything that is in it now. Let me read you from the Democratic platform. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Oh, that will do to laugh over there on the Republican side, but these gentlemen on the Democratic side can not laugh at it when they get home. That platform says:

"We favor the enactment by Congress of legislation that will suppress the pernicious practice of gambling in agricultural products by organized exchanges and others.

"Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the committee has just admitted that this bill regulates but does not suppress gambling in farm products. Keep all of the regulation in it, but give us an opportunity to put some suppression in it, whether through the taxing power or otherwise. The Scott bill passed this House, and my distinguished friend from South Carolina supported it. The Beall bill, practically the same, passed this House, and the gentleman supported it; and why not take off the gag in the motion to suspend and give the Members an opportunity to offer amendments that will have a tendency to suppress gambling in cotton instead of galvanizing into respectability and giving legal status to the worst gambling machine that ever afflicted a civilized people? I defy you to take it off. The worst bills that have ever been passed in this House have been passed under suspension of the rules, because 20 minutes on a side does not give time to show what is wrong in them. When you gentlemen get back home and consult your farmer constituents and they find out that you voted with the president of the New York Cotton Exchange and that you have legalized, whitewashed, and federalized cotton gambling, wheat gambling, corn gambling, and oat gambling I fear you will have a long, hard time before you can explain to them your vote. The idea of this being the only chance to consider this bill! Such false claim as that ought to make every honest man blush for shame! Some gentlemen think the best thing we can do is to put off the consideration of the trust bills until the next session of Congress, the short session.

"Can not this little bill be considered at that session? Can not it be considered now at this session before we adjourn? Vote down the motion to suspend the rules and it remains on the calendar and can be considered in the regular order, in the regular way, open to amendment, and no man need say that this is the only opportunity to pass this bill. If it becomes the only opportunity, it is because by your vote you make it the only opportunity. Vote down the motion to suspend the rules and give us an opportunity, and then we will keep everything in that is of benefit to commerce and the farmer and take out those features that ought not to be in the bill. I want any man from the South or West or from the North to get up here on the floor of this House and say, 'I am not in favor of the suppression of the artificial fictitious gambling in farm products.' This bill only legalizes the gambling and will give the Federal courts jurisdiction as against your State laws, and I appeal to you to vote down this motion to suspend the rules and let us pass the bill with proper amendments."

At that time I had not seen nor read an editorial from the National Field, June 18, 1914, which I now read:

[Editorial from the National Field, June 18, 1914, official organ of the Farmers' Union.]

A SOUTHERN CONGRESSMAN ASKED BARRETT'S OPINION ON THE LEVER BILL—HE GOT IT.

DEAR SIR: I appreciate the fact that you ask for my opinion on the cotton-future bill, but we see it so differently that I fear you will not appreciate my views.

We may be wrong on this issue, but I shall not advocate the Government legalizing gambling and going into partnership for part of the swill. You say it is a prohibitory tax—then why not make it higher?

I have no compromise to offer.

Yours, very truly, CHAS. S. BARRETT.

In reply to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] I want to say that I am not fooled one bit. I do not know what this bill will do as to others in 1916 or what it will do in 1914; but under a bill like this, that only provides a tax upon cotton sold or bought otherwise than by a prescribed form of contract, as a matter of course everybody who wants to buy and sell phantom cotton futures will use the prescribed contract, and then no tax attaches, and even the difference in fluctuation can be settled in margins. That is all they do now, and that is all they will do.

This bill will not stop gambling in cotton if it has ever existed, and will not prevent it in the future, because men that are gambling do not care anything about the form of contract when they neither expect to accept delivery or make it. This is a bill with no joker in it, because the bill itself is a joker [laughter and applause]; and does not accomplish, and, in the very nature of things, will not accomplish, the purpose for which the legislation was sought, which was to suppress gambling in cotton, the product of the farm; not to legalize the form of a contract by which the tax can be avoided. That is all there is in this bill.

As I understand from the conference report the substance of the bill as it passed the House has not been changed at all. The only effect it will have is possibly to make the people who have been suffering by reason of these things think they have relief, until they find out afterwards that it is no relief at all. Of course it regulates the game, but the game is gambling. A tax upon the cotton bought and sold upon the exchanges, to be refunded upon the execution of the contract by the delivery of the cotton, would stop fictitious contracts. To make it unlawful to use the mails or the telegraph or the telephone in the doing of this business would so cripple it that these exchanges would pass out of business to the extent of the gambling they do, which is 99 per cent of their entire business.

Now, nobody wants to abolish any exchange or real exchange business. We have no objection to dealing in cotton on the exchange, but we object to dealing in the name of cotton by which cotton itself is affected, its price and commercial importance.

Now, I do not think that there is a man in the House who is for this bill that has any but the highest motives in so doing, but it is not going to do the thing that it purports to do. The people are not getting what they demanded and what was promised to them, which was suppression, not regulation.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would like to ask the gentleman if section 3 of this act does not absolutely license gambling in cotton futures?

Mr. SIMS. I think it makes that which has always been called "gambling" legal, provided you use a particular form of contract.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It licenses gambling in future contracts?

Mr. SIMS. It licenses what is the equivalent of gambling where you can settle by a specified margin, put up in advance, dependent upon the loss or gain in the contract. It is gambling and can not be anything else.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for a short question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. By whom, in the gentleman's opinion, will this tax eventually be paid—by the gambler or the farmer?

Mr. SIMS. A tax must always be a burden upon the product upon which the tax is levied, directly or indirectly.

Mr. Speaker, I promised not to use much time. I regret that this bill falls short of what the good men behind it intended. I can not think it does what it purports to do, and therefore I can not support it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. LEVER rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I presume there is more misinformation in this House as to the terms of this bill than there has been upon any bill that has ever been brought before the House.

The gentleman from Kansas, my good friend MURDOCK, when this bill was before the House the other day, announced himself as in favor of the Senate proposition. The Senate proposition does not differ in its purpose one iota from the House proposition. The Senate proposition is—

That no person, firm, joint-stock company, society, association, or corporation, their managers or officers, who are members of any exchange, society, corporation, or association in which or through which any contract or contracts for the future delivery of cotton are made shall send through the United States mail any letter, document, pamphlet, or other matter in the promotion or furtherance of the making or enforcing of such contract or contracts unless such exchange, society, corporation, or association shall require all such contracts for future delivery of cotton to comply with the following conditions.

And these conditions are the adoption of Government standards, commercial different system, and many of the other restriction provisions of the House bill. The House proposition goes a good deal further in its restriction, and requires specifically that low-grade cotton, "dog-tail," "rejections," and the like, which for years and years have been held in the warehouses of the New York Cotton Exchange to depress the price of the cotton crop, shall not be deliverable upon these contracts.

Now, if the gentleman believed in the Senate proposition, he ought to believe all the more in the House proposition, because both propositions look to the same end. But the House proposition gets to that end a little bit more rigidly, that is all.

Now, then, my friend from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], answering the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD], says that this tax will be paid by the producers of cotton. I want to say that this tax of 2 cents a pound, amounting to $1,000 a contract, is not going to be paid by anybody, for the simple reason that the tax is absolutely prohibitive, and no one is going to be willing to violate the law and deal in such a contract and pay the penalty of a thousand dollars per contract for doing so, so that the exchanges of this country, in order to escape the taxation involved in the bill, are going to adopt the contract that this bill sets out as a proper contract to be dealt in.

Now, a statement is made also by my friend from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], who, I imagine, would not know a cotton stalk from a jimson weed, but who has bloomed out as the great friend of the cotton farmer this afternoon. The gentleman reads a letter from the president of the farmers' union, saying that there is nothing in this bill in the interest of the farmer. I know the president of the farmers' union, and I do not hesitate to say this: I believe, in my capacity as a Representative from South Carolina of my immediate district, that I know as much about the needs and the wishes of the farmers of South Carolina, and of my district, as does Mr. Barrett or anybody else. I believe that the southern men on the Committee on Agriculture are as loyal to the farmers of the country and know their needs as well and have as much ability to represent their needs as Mr. Barrett or anybody else. I know the gentleman. I like him personally. He is all right. But I venture to assert that Mr. Barrett has not given to this subject the study and the thought that the Members from the South have given to it, or that the committee has given to it; and the reading of a letter from Mr. Barrett or Mr. Anybody else on a subject about which I am personally informed does not change my opinion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEVER. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman is the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And that committee handles the forest reserves of the United States. I am very glad of this opportunity, if the gentleman will permit me, to make the point that in all probability, inasmuch as the gentleman said, and with some truth, that I would not know a jimson weed from a cotton stalk, that in all probability a letter signed by Mr. Barrett with regard to cotton matters should have fully as much weight as a letter from Mr. Gifford Pinchot to him on forestry matters in my State, and the other for Western States, which do not have cotton but do have timber. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

Mr. LEVER. Yes; that is all right. I will say to the gentleman that I think the time ought to come in this House, and I believe has come, when the judgment of Members of Congress who are responsible to their constituents, and who answer to them every two years, ought not to be warped by letters sent to them. I am willing to receive information from my people. I am willing to get information from the people of this country upon matters in which I am interested; but when I have given years and years of thought to a question, when we have had before the committee the best expert testimony that can be had, when I have submitted this proposition to the experts of the Department of Agriculture, when their judgment agrees with my judgment, and that judgment is concurred in by practically every Democrat from the South, I am not willing to let a letter from somebody stop me in the performance of my duty in this matter or any other.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Did Mr. Barrett, the president of the farmers' union, come before the Committee of Agriculture when they were framing this bill?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Barrett was invited especially by myself and another member of the committee, as was the president of every farmers' union in every State of the South. They did not come, and they offered no objection to this bill before the committee.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. And no suggestion?

Mr. LEVER. And no suggestion. Now, one other thing. When this bill was before the House the other day the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] made the statement that he desired to offer a bill which he had introduced at the request of the farmers' union. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] introduced two bills on the subject, as I ascertained after he made that statement. One was practically a copy of the Senate bill dealing with this question under the powers granted to Congress in its control of the postal system and of interstate commerce, and the other was almost identical in terms with the bill which I had the honor to introduce, and which passed this House. He said that he wanted to offer one of those bills, I do not know which, but both of them sought to do exactly the same thing, regulate and not destroy, and that he wished to do so at the request of the farmers' union. The statement was made that they were drawn by the officers of the farmers' union.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture for what purpose this tax of 2 cents per pound is levied in section 3.

Mr. LEVER. The members of the Committee on Agriculture, I will say very frankly to the gentleman from Florida, believe that certain cotton exchanges in this country dealing in future contracts are using a contract that is absolutely detrimental to the farmers of the South. I believe, and have so said repeatedly, that that contract is causing the southern farmers a loss of not less than $100,000,000 a year. We have levied the tax in section 3 to drive out of existence that kind of contract and—we have nothing to conceal—to make legal a contract which we think represents the value of the bulk of the cotton crop of this country.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, will the gentleman answer another question? Section 3 makes the tax levied upon any contract for future delivery made on or in any exchange, board of trade, or similar institution. Suppose a contract is made somewhere else; then the tax does not apply, does it?

Mr. LEVER. It does not.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Why that distinction?

Mr. LEVER. Simply because we did not believe your people or my people desire to levy a tax upon a private agreement between John Smith of your district, a cotton buyer, and William Jones, a cotton farmer.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does not the gentleman think the evils would be as great in a contract of that character made between individuals as if made on a cotton exchange?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman that we did not want to write into this bill any provision taxing spot cotton transactions.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. This is not a spot cotton transaction.

Mr. LEVER. Oh, yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; it is a transaction for future delivery.

Mr. LEVER. But we did not want to tax a contract for the future delivery of actual cotton if made between private individuals and not through these exchanges or associations.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Not necessarily. In section 3 you have taxed contracts made for future delivery, which, of course, will not be made if those contracts are made in an exchange or similar institution.

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, I ask the gentleman what is the difference in a contract of that character, whether actually made in a cotton exchange or board of trade, or made in a private office, if it is not intended to deliver the actual cotton?

Mr. LEVER. I think I see what the gentleman is driving at. The contract referred to in section 3 is a contract where delivery is contemplated, but, as a matter of fact, delivery is not ordinarily made.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. The contract that the gentleman refers to, or the other kind of contract, is a contract where delivery is always made.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Oh, no; I refer to cases where delivery is not made and not intended to be made.

Mr. LEVER. I confess I never saw such a transaction.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Made between individuals?

Mr. LEVER. I never have.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It occurs every day.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am not mistaken at all.

Mr. LEVER. Perhaps I do not get the gentleman's meaning; but I never saw a contract such as is sought to be regulated by this bill between individuals in my life, unless it was the contract specified in section 3, where cotton was not delivered.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does not the gentleman know that contracts are made every day in the cotton section in the cotton season as between individuals, when the thing does not approach a board of trade or exchange at all, but is made simply between individuals?

Mr. LEVER. Is the gentleman talking about a bucket shop?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. You may call it a bucket shop or call it what you please; but these contracts are made as between individuals for future delivery, when it is never intended that there shall be any delivery at all; but they are not made in an exchange, not made in a board of trade, not made in any regularly constituted institution of this character——

Mr. LEVER. I think I catch what the gentleman is driving at. Such a contract made in a bucket shop, if an interstate transaction, would be reached by this bill, and even if an intrastate transaction, it would be reached. As a matter of fact, the bucket shops in this country in nearly every State have been driven out of business by State legislation.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Not all of them; some are still in existence.

Mr. LEVER. If the court will hold that a bucket shop is a similar institution to an exchange or board of trade, then the bill would reach it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; if the courts would hold that.

Mr. LEVER. And I believe the courts would hold that.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman is entitled to that opinion; but I do not agree with him. Now, I want to ask this question, and it is the gist of the whole situation: How does the gentleman from South Carolina, or his committee, justify the levying of a tax upon the carrying on of a business which all of us denounce as absolutely illegal?

Mr. LEVER. I say to the gentleman frankly that there are transactions on future markets which I do not look upon as illegitimate. I believe that speculation, when it is fair speculation, is absolutely legitimate. I believe that this Congress could do no greater injury to the cotton farmers of the South than to say that people shall not express their optimism and hope in that great crop. I believe you would absolutely paralyze the price of cotton if you said that millions in the future could not believe in the higher price of cotton.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The principal changes made in conference, as I understand, are these: You have changed the tax from 1 cent to 2 cents. A provision is put in which practically abolishes the present standards of nine grades which run from middling fair to good ordinary. You strike out that part of the bill which requires the contract to name as a basis some one of the nine Government grades fixed in the original House bill, and in lieu thereof you substitute a provision which authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to establish new standard grades. Another change is that you remove the inhibitions against ring settlements, set out in section 10, on all the contracts drawn in compliance with the provisions of section 5. Those are the principal changes in conference.

Mr. LEVER. Yes; and we have added a provision that nothing in the bill shall interfere with existing contracts.

Mr. WINGO. I would like to ask this further question: We have had Government standard grades for practically four years past, the nine grades being from middling fair to good ordinary. Now, these standards have been adopted by all the cotton exchanges in this country.

Mr. LEVER. In answer to the gentleman's question I say that it is very doubtful, in my opinion and in that of the Solicitor of Agriculture, who is an able lawyer, whether or not we have ever had any official standard. The official standards, so called, were established or promulgated under authority of an item in the Agricultural appropriation bill. I began to look into that proposition, and I concluded that it would be unwise to adopt legislation predicated upon something that had any doubt whatever about its legality. I submitted the question to the solicitor of the department, and he concluded there was doubt about it, and hence we introduced into this bill a provision for the reestablishment or repromulgation of official standards.

Mr. WINGO. Is it not true that all the cotton exchanges of the country, including both New Orleans and New York, have already adopted what is now called the Government standard of nine grades?

Mr. LEVER. The New Orleans Cotton Exchange, immediately after the standards were established, did adopt them. The New York Cotton Exchange adopted them during this spring, and the spot cotton exchanges of the country adopted these standards only in the early part of May.

Mr. WINGO. I am talking about the exchanges where future contracts are dealt in. New Orleans adopted it immediately after their promulgation by the Government, and the New York Cotton Exchange some time this spring.

Mr. LEVER. To go into effect this next year.

Mr. WINGO. I thought it went into effect in September. The Liverpool Cotton Exchange has adopted the United States Government's standards, to go into effect the 1st day of September, except in the description of the standards they use the word "fully" instead of "strict" in three different grades.

Mr. LEVER. The standard of the Liverpool exchange is practically the same as the United States, except the basis middling is a little lower grade. A cotton man told me the other day that he would rather sell cotton on the basis of the Liverpool exchange than the New York Cotton Exchange, because the basis was a little lower.

Mr. WINGO. That is a little difference that comes by comparison of standards, and that will come anywhere. The gentleman stated a moment ago that there would be no tax collected, because the object of the tax is prohibitive. In other words, it would prohibit them from using contracts which you say are now complained of, and which will not be used any more, and therefore there will be no tax collected.

Mr. LEVER. I do not think there will be; of course there may be a little.

Mr. WINGO. If the members of the New York Cotton Exchange made the sale of 100,000,000 bales a year for future delivery, just so they comply with section 5, no tax will be collected.

Mr. LEVER. None whatever.

Mr. WINGO. Now, let us consider this amendment to section 10 proposed by the conference report:

> This section shall not be construed to apply to any contract or sale made in compliance with section 5.

Now, they can conduct all of their transactions under a form of contract provided by section 5. If they do that—and I am frank to say they can—then will the restrictions set out in section 10 apply to these contracts?

Mr. LEVER. Not at all.

Mr. WINGO. That is the object of the amendment proposed in conference.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman this: That section 10 has reference only to future contracts which are not future contracts as we ordinarily know them. They are f. o. b. contracts, contracts to mature in the future. A cotton-mill man desires 1,000 bales from a farmer for delivery next March. He makes a contract with you. You buy this 1,000 bales of strict middling deliverable at a certain time in the future. We were afraid that unless we specifically set out in the bill a section which made that kind of a contract possible without any tax applying whatever to it that some courts somewhere might hold that the tax provided in section 3 would apply to that kind of a contract, and that is what we did not want to happen. Now, as to the amendment proposed, after the bill had gone through the House a good many letters came pouring in to members of the committee, to the gentleman from Georgia, the gentleman from Mississippi, the conferees of the Senate, and myself, saying that that kind of contract was not specifically exempted from taxation and asked us as a matter of precaution to put in the language we have. I personally do not think it makes a particle of difference, because I do not think that kind of contract is taxable.

Mr. WINGO. The only practical difference between section 5 and section 10 is contained in the fourth subdivision of section 10. The first proposition of section 5, page 7, practically is the same language as the first provision of section 10, page 13, is it not? The first provision in section 5 is this:

> First. Conform to the requirements of section 4 of and the rules and regulations made pursuant to this act.

Now, the second provision under section 5 is this:

> Second. Specify the basis grade for the cotton involved in the contract, which shall be one of the grades for which standards are established by the Secretary of Agriculture, except grades prohibited from being delivered on a contract made under this section by the fifth subdivision of this section, the price per pound at which the cotton of such basis grade is contracted to be bought or sold, the date when the purchase or sale was made, and the month or months in which the contract is to be fulfilled or settled: Provided, That middling shall be deemed the basis grade incorporated into the contract if no other basis grade be specified either in the contract or in the memorandum evidencing the same.

Now, the same section, the same subdivision of section 10, is practically the same——

Mr. LEVER. No. It is:

Second. Specify the grade, type, sample, or description of the cotton involved in the contract, the price per pound at which such cotton is contracted to be bought or sold, the date of the purchase or sale, and the time when shipment or delivery of such cotton is to be made.

Mr. WINGO. What is the distinction?

Mr. LEVER. The distinction is this: The gentleman will notice that section 5——

Mr. WINGO. I read section 5 first.

Mr. LEVER. Says that the contract shall specify the basis grade.

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. And for the purpose of this act the basis grade shall be considered strict middling. Now, a basis grade is a representative—a grade from which grade grades are measured above and below.

That is the basis grade. The New York Cotton Exchange deals in a basis contract. The New Orleans Cotton Exchange deals in a basis contract.

Mr. WINGO. I note a provision in section 5 with reference to basis grade that if there is no basis grade specified in the contract then middling shall be considered the basis grade.

Mr. LEVER. Exactly.

Mr. WINGO. So there is no difference. Now, section 10 says that it shall specify the grade, but it does contain a provision as to what shall be the basis if it is not specified, but the first subdivision of section 10 covers that anyway by referring to the regulations and provisions of the act.

Mr. LEVER. The rules and regulations of the act.

Mr. WINGO. Well, assuming there is a difference——

Mr. LEVER. Let me get into the gentleman's head the real difference. The contract referred to in section 5, which the gentleman has read, is a basis contract; it is a future contract, as we understand the word "future." It is a contract which has written into it the idea there is going to be a delivery upon it, but it is a contract which everybody knows is not going to have cotton delivered in fulfillment.

Mr. WINGO. In other words, it is what is known as a "gambling contract."

Mr. LEVER. It is a New York Cotton Exchange contract; it is a New Orleans Cotton Exchange contract, a Bremen contract, a Havre contract, and a Liverpool Cotton Exchange contract. Now, we were afraid that the contracts between the millman and the farmer for future delivery might fall within the tax provisions of this bill and be taxed, hence we put into this bill section 10.

Now, the second subdivision of section 10 says that the contract shall specify the grade. It does not say the basis grade, but says it shall specify the grade, type, sample, or description of the cotton involved in the contract, the price per pound at which such cotton is to be bought or sold, the date of the purchase or sale, the time when shipment and delivery of such cotton is to be made, and so forth. Subdivision 3 says that when such a contract is made and delivery is made upon it that the cotton shall be within the grade or price or according to the sample or description specified in the contract. For instance, under the terms of section 5, subsection 7 of the bill, you would not be able to deliver on a contract on the New York or New Orleans Cotton Exchange cotton less in value than "good ordinary" in settlement of that contract for delivery, if delivery was called for. You could not, under that section, deliver what is known as "repacked" cotton or "water-packed" cotton, or what we know as "offings," "rejections," and "dog-tails" of the cotton crop. But it does not follow that we should prohibit the right of contract as to cotton that is denied delivery under the terms of section 5. For instance, we might want to make such cotton into padding for horse collars, or automobile tires, or something of that kind, and we did not want to run the risk of taxing it. So we say we can deal in that cotton free of taxation, if, when the delivery is made, it is of the contract grade.

Mr. WINGO. The contracts referred to in section 5 are——

Mr. LEVER. Are what you call "gambling" contracts.

Mr. WINGO. "Gambling contracts." In other words, that is intended to reform the gambling contracts on the New York Cotton Exchange?

Mr. LEVER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WINGO. Section 10 is intended to apply to those contracts when a planter comes in and wants to get advances and makes a contract for delivery in the fall. That is why you have two exempted classes? The New York Cotton Exchange is exempt if they have a contract like section 5 provides. Now, that being true, why is it that you put the provision on "ring" settlement in the planter's contract and leave it out of the "gambler's" contract?

Mr. LEVER. We put it in this contract because we did not want to leave a loophole in this bill which might result in the building up of quasi exchanges in this country where the present pernicious methods of the future markets could be pursued under color of law. However, every student of the question knows that if you force delivery upon one of the contracts of the New York Cotton Exchange by law, that that is the end of that exchange.

Mr. WINGO. Now, right there. In the matter of forcing delivery, a contract for the delivery of cotton is not such a contract of which a court of equity will require a specific performance? Now, is not that true?

Mr. LEVER. I am not sure that the gentleman is correct in his legal proposition. I am not a lawyer.

Mr. WINGO. Let us use an illustration. It will not take a lawyer to get at it, but I think you know the law. Suppose you make a contract under section 5 that by this bill you make legitimate and does not have to be taxed. Suppose I sell you on the New York Cotton Exchange 10,000 bales of December cotton at 10 cents. When December comes, the day of fulfillment, or settlement, or whatever you call it, December cotton is quoted at 12 cents. Now, you come to me and say, "I want my cotton." I say, "I have not any cotton, and I will not give it to you." I will say I will give you the 2 cents difference, and you will say, "I do not want that; I want my cotton." Do you not know that if you consulted a lawyer he would tell you that the measure of damages would be the difference between the contract price of the cotton and the price at which you could buy that cotton in the open market?

Mr. LEVER. On the contract, if such a contract is made between you and me, and I came to you and said, "I want my cotton, and I will not take anything else than my cotton; I will not take a difference settlement," I have a right under the present contract even to get my cotton unless the cotton can not be had on account of "providential hindrance"—a ship doing down, or something like that.

Mr. SIMS. You do not mean to say you can "replevy" on the exchange?

Mr. LEVER. Not on the exchange. The gentleman from Tennessee knows about this bill, because he has studied it sufficiently to realize that the contracts of the New York Exchange require now that if delivery is demanded delivery shall be made. The gentleman knows that. Will he not admit it?

Mr. SIMS. It is only a money damage, then. It is not a specific damage.

Mr. LEVER. You can not get something out of nothing, of course. But if cotton can be made, it can be had.

Mr. WINGO. My illustration was that I can go and sell to you something I do not have. I make my contract read like section 5 expresses it, and when December comes I have not the cotton, how is the exchange or any court on earth going to force me to deliver the cotton? Is it not true that the only relief would be an action for damages for breach of contract, and the measure of damages would be the difference between the contract price and the price at which you can get the cotton in the open market?

Mr. LEVER. Well, I will admit that you can not get blood out of a turnip, but there is not a member of the New York Cotton Exchange to-day, and I doubt if there is a member of any exchange in the world to-day, who would make a contract which he did not believe he could fulfill when delivery came, if delivery was called for, and if he did not he would be kicked off of the exchange so quickly it would make his head swim.

Mr. WINGO. Then, how do you explain the fact that they sell fifteen times more cotton on the New York Exchange than there is cotton actually made?

Mr. LEVER. On the same principle that I have seen a one-dollar bill discharge 40 debts.

Mr. WINGO. The proposition is to prohibit fake tenders? How are you going to force actual delivery on 100,000,000 bales?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman does not understand my viewpoint at all.

Mr. WINGO. What I am trying to get at is your viewpoint.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman frankly that we are going into the academic proposition, and I do not care how much cotton is bought and sold on the New York Cotton Exchange, when a cotton-mill man or a farmer, or a merchant, who engages in the use of a hedge upon that market, calls for his cotton, he is assured that he is not going to have delivered to him unspinnable, unmerchantable, unusable cotton.

Mr. WINGO. Now, one other question before I get through. Is not paragraph 4 of section 10 the only provision of your bill prohibiting "set-offs" or "ring settlements"? That is the only place in your bill where you place any prohibition on "set-offs" or "ring settlements"?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; and we do that to save the country from having a dozen little gambling dens springing up everywhere.

Mr. WINGO. That is the only provision in the bill where you have any prohibition against "set-offs" and "ring settlements," and by this amendment to section 10, which the conferees propose, you seek to amend it by stating that the provisions of section 10 shall not apply to section 5 contracts; and then you have not a single inhibition in your bill against "ring settlements" and gambling contracts, because you expressly say that these "ring settlements" and gambling contracts shall not apply under section 5, which you say are gambling contracts.

Mr. LEVER. I thought the gentleman from Arkansas knew this, that this bill was not predicated upon the idea of preventing the dealing in future contracts if those contracts were contracts which represented the bulk of the value of the cotton crop of the South and whose value was not fixed by the low grades of the cotton crop, but by the bulk of the cotton crop. The gentleman knows that I am too frank to conceal it——

Mr. WINGO. Yes; I know that——

Mr. LEVER. That there is no intention whatever in this bill to destroy the New York Cotton Exchange, and there is no intention whatever in this bill to destroy the New Orleans Cotton Exchange. The intention of this bill is to regulate the transactions in such a way as to force them to use a contract which represents the bulk of the value of the cotton crop of Tennessee, South Carolina, and the other cotton-producing States.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for just one question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.

Mr. LEVER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to ask the gentleman if he and his committee have any well-considered opinion as to the effect of this bill, if it should become a law, as to the closing of cotton exchanges? What effect will it have upon the cotton exchanges of the country in the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. LEVER. You mean New Orleans and New York particularly—that type of exchanges?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. It will not close either of them.

Mr. SIMS. Would it not increase their business?

Mr. LEVER. It would not surprise me a particle if it did increase their business. I would be glad if it would, and for this reason, that if there is going on, with respect to any commodity, a lively bidding, a lively buying, and a lively selling, you would never see the price of that commodity go down. Under all economic laws it would go up.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to ask the gentleman this further question: Is it not a fact that in the hearings the president of the New York Cotton Exchange gave it as his opinion that the enactment of this bill into law would increase the business of the exchanges?

Mr. LEVER. I really could not say. It would not surprise me if he had said that. I will say to the gentleman this: I have had not one, but dozens of the biggest firms in New York, cotton people, say that the destruction of the New York Cotton Exchange and of the Liverpool Exchange, and exchanges of that type would increase their profits hundreds of millions of dollars a year, because it would give them an absolute monopoly of the cotton business.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Can the gentleman give to the House his opinion as to whether that is true and some substantial reason upon which to base that opinion?

Mr. LEVER. I made the statement when the Underwood amendment was pending to the tariff bill, and I make it again, that if you destroy the future market of this country for cotton, you would build up the greatest monopoly in cotton that the world ever saw, and that that monopoly would consist of the big spot-cotton dealers of the country combining with the great cotton-mill people of the country.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then the gentleman's position is that in order to maintain respectable prices for agricultural products in this country we must maintain by law institutions designed to promote gambling in those products?

Mr. LEVER. No. The gentleman designates legitimate speculation as gambling. I do not. That is just where we differ.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask the gentleman just one question. I know the gentleman is well informed.

Mr. LEVER. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. Is it not a fact that no person can buy or sell cotton on these exchanges unless he is a member of the exchange?

Mr. LEVER. That is true.

Mr. SIMS. And therefore the exchanges, so far as this law is concerned, have the absolute monopoly of all dealing under this law?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman knows that the exchanges make their business out of their commissions largely, and they appeal to the public. The gentleman knows more about this business than I do.

Mr. SIMS. And nobody can either buy or sell on the exchanges unless they are members?

Mr. LEVER. I said I believed that was true.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. The question I have in mind is just this: Under this law the spinner can hedge on his contract safely, can he not?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; and he can not do so under the existing situation to-day.

Mr. CARAWAY. The bill meets the approval of the spinners?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will not this be true with the spinner under this bill—because he can hedge his contracts perfectly—that he will be able to wait and take his chance on the cotton crop being large and the price being low, and need not go into the market when the farmer is offering his cotton on the market, and need not be compelled to buy them? He can have a contract that will actually protect him, and he can wait until December or January or February, because he can buy on the future market in May, and have a contract that he can enforce, and he can wait until the farmer has not a bale in his hands before he is under the necessity of buying?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Arkansas will understand that the cotton mill man is buying cotton and selling cloth every day in the year. Every time he buys a bale of cotton he uses the exchange as a hedge, and every time he sells a hundred bales of cloth he still uses the exchange as a hedge. He is hedging every day if he can find an opportunity. The difficulty has been that the New York Cotton Exchange contract with the spinner always underbids the value of cotton, because of the fear of that contract.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know the contract is bad, but do you not think there is some danger, because he has a perfect hedge now, that if the price of cotton in the hands of the farmer in September or October is high, he can safely wait?

Mr. LEVER. Not at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. You do not think so?

Mr. LEVER. I think, on the contrary, you will find that the price of cotton will be five or six dollars a bale higher when this bill gets into operation.

Mr. DAVIS. I have talked with quite a number of Members recently, and the question has arisen, after the passage of your bill, can anyone make a contract for the future delivery of cotton, or purchase it, without any intention of there being an actual delivery of the cotton?

Mr. LEVER. He can if his contract conforms to section 5 of the bill. The contract itself provides, and all the contracts of the exchanges provide, for the delivery of cotton. But you know and I know, and all of those who have studied the question know, that while the delivery is contemplated it is rarely made.

Mr. DAVIS. Then will there be any change in that future delivery by virtue of this bill if the contract is made in accordance with it?

Mr. LEVER. No; there will not.

Mr. DAVIS. And you can buy and sell without any purpose to deliver?

Mr. LEVER. Why, yes.

Mr. SISSON. Under this bill, if cotton is bought or sold on the exchange under one of these contracts, under the rules of the exchange you can give notice 10 days before the date of the delivery——

Mr. LEVER. Five.

Mr. SISSON. Five days before the date of delivery that you will demand the spot cotton?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. What assurance have you under this bill that you will get the cotton that you bought, and of the grade?

Mr. LEVER. None whatever, I will say to the gentleman frankly, because if we wrote in the law that delivery of cotton must be made, it would close the exchanges.

Mr. SISSON. That is not my question at all.

Mr. LEVER. I did not catch the gentleman's question.
Mr. SISSON. My question was this——
Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman has agreed to yield some time to me, and I do not want it all taken up by questions.
Mr. SISSON. The gentleman wants some votes for his bill, does he not?
The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes left of his hour. To whom does the gentleman yield?
Mr. LEVER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.
Mr. SISSON. Suppose he does demand a delivery of the cotton?
Mr. LEVER. He will get the cotton and the grade or else he will be kicked off the exchange under their rules.
Mr. SISSON. Will he get exactly that grade?
Mr. LEVER. Yes; if he contracts for a specific grade.
Mr. SISSON. Suppose he buys it basis middling?
Mr. LEVER. Then he will get it fixed within the limits of this bill.
Mr. SISSON. What is that limit?
Mr. LEVER. From middling fair to good ordinary.
Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. All spinnable?
Mr. LEVER. All spinnable.
Mr. SISSON. How many points is that above or below basis middling?
Mr. LEVER. That varies. Good ordinary may be 150 points below basis middling. It has got to be good spinnable cotton. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] three minutes.
Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this measure. It does not contain all the provisions that I would like to see in a bill of this kind, but I want to say to my good friend from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] that I have studied this question a great deal, and this bill has five propositions in it that will be of great value to the cotton producers; and when it comes to the grain bill, I shall try to aid the western gentlemen in getting what they want on the grain proposition. I believe I do know a little more about this cotton proposition than does my good friend from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]. There are five good provisions in this bill.
First. It requires the cotton exchanges to use the standard grades.
Second. It requires a record to be kept of all transactions on the exchange.
Third. It requires the Secretary of Agriculture to settle disputes as to grades named in the contract, and takes this power away from the committee on the exchange.
Fourth. It requires the delivery of spinable cotton on contracts, and prevents the tendering of dog-tail cotton to beat down the price of good cotton.
Fifth. It prevents the arbitrary fixed difference now employed on the New York Cotton Exchange and requires the commercial difference, and authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to go to five spot markets in the South to obtain that commercial difference. These are all good provisions, and while there are some features of this bill I would change, I am so anxious to get some of these provisions enacted into law that I am going to vote for the measure; and if it does not work as I think it should, I will help to amend it.
I want to say to gentlemen on this side of the House that if you cast your votes against this bill you are voting to continue the present order of things on the exchanges. We have now on the cotton exchanges the rottenest rules in the world. [Applause.] The farmers are being robbed under these conditions every year in the South, and I beg you, gentlemen, not to oppose legislation on this question at this time. Do not be placed in the attitude of favoring the present conduct of the New York Exchange. You had better cast your vote for a measure that has some good in it rather than to vote to continue the present condition of things. [Applause.] Gentlemen from the West will want legislation on grain pretty soon, and I hope to help them get it, and I trust that they will not stand in the way of cotton-exchange legislation when we come from the cotton belt and ask for that regulation. [Applause.] It is not long until the December term of Congress. Let us take this long step in the right direction, and when we watch the bill in operation we can amend it, if it needs amending. [Applause.]
Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.
Mr. WINGO. I trust the gentleman will withhold that. Every time this question comes up, those in favor of absolute suppression have not been given any time. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.
Mr. MANN. Anybody is entitled to the floor. How much time does the gentleman from South Carolina want? Mr. Speaker, I ask that the time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] be extended 10 minutes.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from South Carolina be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?
Mr. SHERLEY. And I ask that at the end of that time the previous question be considered as ordered.
Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I can not agree to that. The gentleman can move the previous question.
Mr. SHERLEY. This is an unusual request to extend the time, and I am trying to save the time of ordering the previous question.
Mr. MANN. Anybody is entitled to the floor, and I was doing it to save time.
Mr. SHERLEY. That was my object.
Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I will move the previous question at the end of 10 minutes.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois, that the time of the gentleman from South Carolina be extended 10 minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The message is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of a provision of law contained in the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, that "Hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law," I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress and for its determination whether it will authorize the acceptance of the invitation a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, being an invitation from the Government of the French Republic to that of the United States to send delegates to the International Conference on Social Insurance, to be held at Paris in September, 1914, and a letter from the Department of Labor showing the favor with which that department views the proposed gathering.
It will be observed that the acceptance of this invitation involves no special appropriation of money by the Government.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 27, 1914.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that next Saturday may be set aside for District of Columbia business.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that Saturday next be set aside for the transaction of District of Columbia business. Is there objection?
Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he has any very pressing matters on the calendar?
Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. We have a number of bills on the calendar that ought to be disposed of some way or other.
Mr. FINLEY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, unless there is some matter of great importance and very pressing, I will be compelled to object.

Mr. BURNETT. I am not on the committee, but there is a matter relating to the Plaza awards in which are concerned many poor people whose money ought to be paid them. It is now the pending question carried over from the last District day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FINLEY. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will withdraw his request, and perhaps we can come to some understanding, but for the present I shall be compelled to object.

LUCIEN P. ROGERS.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Speaker lay before the House the bill H. R. 8688.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill H. R. 8688, an act for the relief of Lucien P. Rogers, with a Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that that was simply an error in the data, which has been corrected in the Senate. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the pending political issues.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

REGULATION OF COTTON FUTURES.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, has the Speaker announced whether there was a quorum?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to count.

Mr. LEVER. I hope the gentleman from Florida will withdraw his point of no quorum and allow us to finish the debate.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman from South Carolina will withdraw his objection to setting aside Saturday as District day——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request to set aside Saturday as District day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky withdraws his request to set aside next Saturday as District day, and the gentleman from Florida withdraws his point of no quorum.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Oh, no, Mr. Speaker; I said if the gentleman from South Carolina would withdraw his objection to the request to set aside Saturday as District day.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, what is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is to proceed with this debate.

Mr. MURDOCK. Was objection made to that?

The SPEAKER. No; the way the objection came up was that the gentleman from Kentucky asked that Saturday next be set aside for District business, and the gentleman from South Carolina objected. Then gentlemen were asking to extend remarks when the gentleman from Florida raised the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eleven Members present; not a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 231 Members, a quorum, have answered to their names. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I regret we have not more time in which to consider this question. Unfortunately those of us who believe in carrying out the pledges which were made to the cotton farmers of the South to absolutely prohibit gambling in cotton have had very little opportunity at the two different times this question has come up at this Congress. We have not had opportunity on either occasion to even offer the legislation which is confessed by all to be a protection to the cotton farmer—that is, the Scott bill or the Beall bill. I am opposed to the adoption of this conference report, Mr. Speaker, and in the short time allowed me I want to give my reasons. It is admitted that section 5 of the bill deals with what are called gambling contracts on the New York Cotton Exchange. You will note that if these gambling contracts are in the form prescribed, then they are exempt from the prohibitive tax levied by this bill. The chairman of the committee is very sure of that. He is very sure that the gamblers will all comply, so that there will not be any tax collected. He is correct, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is wrong. The gentleman from Alabama undertook to say there were five different propositions in this bill and he gave two. One was that it would establish Government standard grades. Well, we already have Government standard grades and have had for three years and nine months.

Mr. HEFLIN. The New York Cotton Exchange has not had it.

Mr. WINGO. The bill as it passed the House recognized those Government standard grades. The conference report abolishes them and leaves it to the Secretary of Agriculture to establish in the future such standard grades as he may desire. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] says that this is going to require the cotton exchanges to adopt these standards. If the gentleman from Alabama had read Bulletin 591 of the Department of Agriculture, he would have seen that every cotton exchange in the country, including the New York Cotton Exchange, has already adopted the present Government standards, and the Liverpool Cotton Exchange has adopted the present United States Government standard grades, to take effect on September 1. So there is nothing in the contention that this bill will establish Government standards. The next proposition of the gentleman from Alabama is that we will make these gamblers settle their differences by commercial differences and not by fixed differences. What difference does it make to the cotton farmer how these gamblers settle their differences? The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr LEVER] admits that the operation of this bill will increase gambling operations upon the New York Stock Exchange, and I do not think any man can doubt that. He says this increased gambling will help the legitimate cotton market. There is the point of difference between us. Mr. Speaker, I want to submit that the most dangerous part of the conference report is that amendment proposed by the conferees, which provides that to section 10 shall be added a new paragraph, which reads, "that the provisions of this section shall not apply to contracts under section 5"; that is, gambling contracts. There is a difference between the provisions of section 10 and section 5. We will admit for the sake of argument that the gentleman from South Carolina stated correctly what they are, but paragraph 4 of section 10 is the only place in the bill where "ring settlements" or "set-offs" are prohibited, so what do you do by the adoption of the conference report?

You adopt the amendment to the bill which says the inhibition against "ring settlements" and "set-offs" shall not apply to the gambling contracts of the New York Cotton Exchange. Do you want to do that? Why have an inhibition against "ring settlements" in section 10, which the gentleman says applies to a planter who might want to sell a spinner his cotton crop for future delivery, and leave the gamblers unrestrained? A "ring settlement," according to their own statement, is a settlement among members on the gambling exchange. How could you say that there is a ring settlement by the planter and the cotton buyer?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I believe I will transgress upon the patience of the House and ask for five minutes additional time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from South Carolina be extended for five minutes and that time be yielded to him. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINGO. Now, Mr. Speaker, do we want to exempt the gambling operations upon the New York Cotton Exchange from the restrictive provisions against "ring settlements" contained in subdivision 4 of section 10? Adopt this conference report and that is what you do. Why do you exempt these gamblers from the only provision in the bill requiring actual delivery of cotton? Oh, the gentleman from South Carolina says if you enforce actual delivery you would destroy the gambling exchanges. But you say that if anyone wanted actual cotton delivered he could go into court and force delivery of the cotton. Let us consider whether he can.

Is there a lawyer in this House who will contend seriously that a court of equity will enforce specific performance of a contract calling for the delivery of a commodity that can be bought in the open market? There is not a lawyer here that will stake his reputation as a lawyer upon any such assertion as that. If these gamblers make their contracts under the provisions of section 5, when settlement day comes what will happen? Will they undertake to deliver actual cotton? No; and it is not contended that they could. They could not deliver the 15,000,000 or more bales dealt in. I venture the assertion that on the New York Cotton Exchange on the 1st day of next December, when settling times comes on December contracts, there will be at least 20,000,000 bales of cotton settled for by "ring settlements" or "set offs." That will be 5,000,000 bales more than the entire cotton crop. What will happen? The man who has sold 1,000 bales, at 10 cents, December delivery, and December cotton is then selling at 12 cents, will do what? Settle by differences. But suppose one demands actual cotton; what will be the seller's answer? He will say, "You know it was a gambling contract. You know I am a gambler in 'phantom' cotton. You know I did not intend to deliver actual cotton. I will pay you the 2 cents difference." The purchaser says, "No; I want the cotton. The Lever bill requires you to deliver it to me. I will go into court and see if it will not." He will go into court. What will be the result? Every lawyer knows that he can not force actual delivery, but can only bring suit for damages for breach of contract, and the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the maturity of the contract—2 cents a pound.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WINGO. Not now. I think if the Members from the cotton-growing States would study this bill and study it carefully there would not be as many as five of them vote for a bill of this kind. Why? Because it legalizes and licenses gambling in cotton futures, which we promised to suppress. Is there a man in this House that will go before the cotton growers of the South and say, "I voted to license cotton gambling"? Dare you go to the raiser of the cotton—and I am talking of the farmer who makes from 1 to 20 bales of cotton a year—do you dare go to him and say, "I voted for a bill that permitted, legalized, and licensed gambling on the New York Cotton Exchange, a bill that will increase the number of 'phantom' bales dealt in"? Is there a man here that will tell the cotton farmer that he did that? That will be your position if you vote for this conference report. Every man here knows that the cotton growers of this country want the old Scott bill. Why do you not give it to us? You say the Senate will not pass it. You have not tried the present Senate. This bill was brought up at a time and under a rule that prevented us from offering the old Scott bill as a substitute. If you pass the old Scott bill to stop the gambling, it will go through the Senate, because they do not dare to obstruct it any longer. Do you think you are going to fool the cotton farmer much longer by this jockeying between the House and the Senate on this question? Do you think he is going to take with any degree of credence the statement that we can not possibly get the two Houses together on something that is admitted would absolutely destroy this pernicious evil, the thing that we as a party have pledged we would do? We promised the cotton growers of the South to suppress gambling in cotton, which it is admitted bears down the price of cotton, but by this bill you license the evil. You by this act legalize and protect that which you promised to destroy. For such a course there is neither moral nor political justification. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, for more than a quarter of a century the people of this country have been endeavoring to find a legislative method of dealing effectively with a situation which all admit to be bad. The old Hatch bill passed through the House, went to the Senate, was amended, sent to conference, and there died. The Scott bill was sent by this House to the Senate and it died in committee. The Beall bill, identical in terms, was likewise sent to the Senate, and it, too, died there. And yet the gentleman says, "Why not try the present Senate out?" I call his attention to the fact that the Senate during this year has expressed itself on this proposition and has sent us a bill identical in purpose, differing only in method from the bill we are considering in conference at this time. If the Senate wanted to pass the Scott bill and put it up to the House, why did it not do so? Why did it send to us a bill seeking to regulate and not destroy the exchanges, as it did in the Smith bill, for which this is a substitute. The position of the Senate at this time, according to its own record, is in line with the general purpose of the bill we are about to vote upon. We are nearer an agreement than ever before, and why not agree and get legislation?

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I can not do so. I am sorry, but I have only five minutes.

I want to call the attention of the cotton men on the floor of this House to this fact: That this bill comes from the Committee on Agriculture with every Southern man behind it, and I believe that they are as true and accurate representatives of the cotton growers of the South as is my friend from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO]. More than that, this bill had its inception in the Senate, where it was introduced by Senator E. D. SMITH, of my State, who some years ago organized that great fight in the South for the cotton farmer, which has meant so much for him, and I want to say he is anxious for legislation at this session. No one can question his loyalty to the cotton farmer. He has proved his faith in works.

Another thing, two conferees of the Senate on this bill come from two of the biggest cotton-growing States in the Union, Senator SMITH of Georgia, from that great cotton State, and Senator SHEPPARD, of Texas, from a State which raises one-fourth of all the cotton produced in this country.

I call your attention to the fact that this is a unanimous report. It is agreed to by all of us. It may not represent all that we want, but I call your attention to the fact—and you can not get around it—that if you defeat this legislation to-day, with this Congress on the eve of an adjournment, there is not a sensible man here who does not know, who does not admit in his own heart, that that is the end of legislation in this session of Congress on this proposition.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that I be notified when my time is up, so that I can move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has half a minute remaining.

Mr. LEVER. I am willing to put it up to you, gentlemen. It is either this bill—and we believe it to be a good one—or it is no legislation. Which do you want?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina moves the previous question on the adoption of the conference report. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MURDOCK. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes 15.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WINGO. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 117, noes 45.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-five Members are present—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of agreeing to the conference report will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 146, nays 77, answered "present" 3, not voting 206, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia] is absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not know exactly in what shape to bring up the matter, but I will put it in the form of a parliamentary inquiry, because I can not rise to correct the RECORD, I suppose, as there is no reading of the Journal and no morning hour. Yesterday afternoon I sent to the desk an amendment, a copy of which I have here, proposing to strike out section 5. It was done during the remarks of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. His remarks having been temporarily withheld from the RECORD, I am unable to quote to the Chair exactly what occurred. I notice the amendment I sent to the desk is stated to be "Amendment proposed by Mr. BRANDEGEE," whereas other amendments offered on the same afternoon are stated to be, for instance, "Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. CUMMINS."

I should like to inquire the parliamentary status of the amendment which I sent to the desk. I am led to ask the question because on another part of the amendment it is stated, "Ordered to lie on the table and be printed"; and I am somewhat confused about the parliamentary status of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that possibly Senators do not understand the parliamentary status. For a Senator to send an amendment to the desk which is intended to be proposed as an amendment accomplishes no purpose save that of giving information to Senators as to what the Senator proposes hereafter to do; it is not a presentation of the amendment. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] yesterday, however, did propose an amendment to strike out section 5. In the present parliamentary situation the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut to strike out is the pending amendment before the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CUMMINS. If an amendment to the amendment proposed by the committee is offered, in order to perfect it, would not such an amendment be first voted upon?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That, of course, is a suppositious case; but the Chair believes that Rule VIII does provide that motions to amend the part proposed to be stricken out shall have precedence. If amendments shall be offered to perfect section 5, the Chair is of the opinion that they would have precedence over the motion of the Senator from Connecticut; but no such offer has as yet been made.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, merely in order to present my recollection of what occurred, for what it may be worth, I will state that I think when the remarks of the Senator from Utah are printed they will show what I said was—I am speaking only from memory—that I offered the amendment which I sent to the desk and asked that it might be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has so ruled; but the Chair thinks the Senator from Connecticut will agree with the Chair that if any Senator desires to propose an amendment to the part of the bill which the Senator from Connecticut proposes to strike out, such an amendment would take precedence of the motion to strike out.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the Chair is entirely correct about that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be true if such an amendment is proposed. The Chair, however, does not know whether or not it will be proposed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I can enlist the attention of the Senate for a moment, I want to call attention to what seems to me to have been an error committed on yesterday. We adopted an amendment to section 5, which provides:

Provided, That no order or finding of the court or commission in the enforcement of this section shall be admissible as evidence in any suit, civil or criminal, brought under the antitrust acts.

The provision just referred to is in conflict, at least in its spirit, with a provision which was placed, after a great deal of care and work, in the Clayton bill, which has been reported from the Judiciary Committee. I do not claim there is an absolute conflict, but if one of these provisions should stand the other should not, because they are of the same class and kind and they deal with the same proposition in substance and in a diametrically different way. The provision of the Clayton bill which has just been reported is as follows:

That a final judgment or decree rendered in any suit or proceeding in equity brought by or on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws to the effect that a defendant has violated said laws shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any suit or proceeding brought by any other party against such defendant under said laws as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto.

Now, you will observe that in the amendment adopted to section 5 we expressly provide that neither the finding of the commission nor the judgment of a court affirming the finding of the commission can be introduced in evidence in any proceeding. Of course, that only applies to section 5. When we come, however, to the antitrust bill, commonly called the Clayton bill, it will be seen that we have expressly provided that the decision of a court in any case in which the United States shall be a party may be introduced in evidence and shall constitute a prima facie showing. It seems to me that either the amendment adopted yesterday is wrong or the provision in the Clayton bill is wrong, because they are both of the same character.

Let me illustrate: In the Clayton bill, if a suit is brought by the United States and a decree is rendered, then any individual who might have been injured by any act of a trust or combination in restraint of trade may bring the record in that case and lay it down in a court where he is suing for his damages, or the Government in a similar controversy can introduce it as prima facie evidence, or any litigant can have the benefit of using the evidence once taken and a decree once rendered for the purpose of establishing a prima facie case or for the purpose of making a prima facie showing as to any fact involved in the case. When we come to section 5 we turn squarely around in the other direction; we say that, although the commission shall have made a most exhaustive investigation, although it shall have arrived at a conclusion of fact and of law, and although that conclusion of fact and of law shall have been solemnly affirmed by a court of the United States, it can not be used for any purpose.

It seems to me the amendment adopted yesterday emasculates the Newlands bill—I will refer to it by that name—to a considerable extent. It seems to me that the proper view is presented in the Clayton bill. Everyone understands that the ordinary individual litigant suing for damages on account of the wrongful conduct of a monopoly or an institution engaged in restraining trade and commerce is confronted by the fact that it may cost him ten times or a hundred times the amount of his claim to gather together the evidence, mass it, and bring it to court; and it seems absolutely fair to me that when the question has once been litigated and solemnly settled, the record in that case, in which the Government was the moving party, should be available to be laid down in order to make a prima facie showing. Thus, the private individual, or, indeed, the Government, in another suit involving similar matters would not be obliged to go over all the ground the second time.

I do not understand why the same rule should not apply to section 5 of the Newlands bill. It is my humble judgment that the principal benefit which we will obtain from the creation of a trade commission will be found in the fact that that commission will industriously gather facts; that it will investigate conditions; that it will make findings of fact; and that those findings of fact thus made are to be available to all of the people of the United States who desire to employ them in any litigation with those who have oppressed them.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator from Missouri if this amendment is not also in conflict with section 9b of the Clayton bill as reported from the Senate Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. REED. I will be glad to come to that, and I am of the opinion that it is.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. There is another phase of the amendment which was adopted yesterday that I hope the Senator will comment upon. I may be entirely at fault in my estimate of its serious character—if so, I want to be set right—but I regard it as one of the most amazing features of proposed legislation that was ever seriously contemplated in an Anglo-Saxon deliberative body.

It virtually denies to a man who is upon indictment for the violation of an act of Congress the benefit of a judgment in his favor in reference to the identical thing which constitutes the burden of the indictment, and which has decreed its validity. For example, if a corporation is haled before the commission proposed to be created, charged with unfair competition, and the commission sustains the charge, from which decision an appeal is taken to the Federal court having jurisdiction, and that court determines against the finding and authorizes the continuation of the practice, that is a judgment in favor of the corporation. Shortly afterwards the president of the corporation may be indicted, charged with violating the antitrust acts, the charge consisting of the very thing which the judgment of the court in the other case has authorized the company to do. Yet he can not, if this amendment becomes law and it is constitutional, plead the finding or judgment of that court in defense of the indictment, but may be found guilty, notwithstanding the protection of the judgment. If that is not kindling false lights upon a dangerous shore for the purpose of luring men to destruction, then I am greatly mistaken as to the practical effect of this amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I did not intend when I rose to make any extended remarks, and I do not intend to do so now; I am directing the attention of the Senate to the situation that exists. It seems to me that one of the great benefits to flow from the creation of the trade commission is to be found in the fact that that body of men will investigate certain questions; that they will try out certain issues of fact; that they will render a decision, and when that decision is affirmed in a court, then, that fact having been thus solemnly adjudicated, can be used by all other litigants, and thus the difficulty of going through these long, bitter controversies a dozen or a hundred times be avoided.

Let me illustrate: Suppose a dealer in steel felt that he had been aggrieved by the Steel Trust; that there was a combination to control prices. He files his complaint before the trade commission; the commission spends six months or a year and possibly a hundred thousand dollars of the Government's money to ascertain the truth of that complaint. It finally makes its finding of fact, and the court, after due review, affirms its finding of fact and its conclusion of law. Of course, that ends that one case; but now there are A, B, C, and D, and perhaps hundreds of men throughout the United States standing in exactly the same position as the complaining party in the case to which I have just referred. Shall they each go back to the commission and track the same ground? Shall they each, if they see fit to sue for damages under the Sherman Act, be compelled to mass that same evidence, bring the same witnesses, travel the same ground, and each of them expend a hundred thousand dollars in the trial of a case that has been once solemnly litigated and been solemnly adjudged, or should a judgment when once rendered at least carry with it sufficient weight so that it would constitute a prima facie showing of fact in any other litigation involving a similar proposition?

I think the language employed in the Clayton bill as amended in the Judiciary Committee is the kind of language that ought to appear in this bill. I have already read it; but in substance it provides that a final judgment, when rendered, may be introduced as a prima facie showing in other litigation to the same extent as to all matters in which it would constitute an estoppel between the original parties. That makes it available where the issues are the same. I see no wrong in that; I see no hardship in that; and if we do not avail ourselves of some such advantage as that from the trade commission, it seems to me we will get very little advantage from it.

It seems to me—and I say it with all due respect for my associates and for the author of this amendment—that the amendment, if it stands, almost completely emasculates the trade commission bill, and it is in effect the same thing as pulling the foundation out from under a house. We create vast machinery, an expensive tribunal, we provide for an immense amount of work, and then we deny the people the real advantage of that work.

I submit that some one who voted for this amendment ought to move its reconsideration.

Mr. SUTHERLAND obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for one moment, in order that I may make a correction of the RECORD in a minor matter, but on one personal to myself?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. On yesterday, when the vote was taken upon the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], I am reported, on page 13949, as having said, when my name was called, that it was my opinion that if my pair were present he would vote as I would, and I therefore cast my vote "nay." What I said was that I had been informed by those having the right to speak for the absent Senator that if he were present his vote would be as would mine. I did not express an opinion.

I should like to have that correction made.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment, so that I may say a few words further in connection with what I said before?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has called my attention to another conflict, perhaps more marked than the one to which I referred.

I read from page 69 of the report, which contains an amendment proposed by the Judiciary Committee, known as section 9b. The part to which I am referring is as follows:

> On motion of the commission and on such notice as the court shall deem reasonable, the court shall set down the cause for summary final hearing.

Now, that is after the commission has acted.

> Upon such final hearing the finding of the commission shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, but if either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the proceeding before the commission, the court may allow such additional evidence to be taken before the commission or before a master appointed by the court and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem just.

Accordingly you will observe that in important particulars the Judiciary Committee, in preparing the amendments to the Clayton bill, have carefully provided that the finding of the commission shall be prima facie evidence in litigation other than that before the court when the evidence was taken. If those provisions are to stand, if it is wise that they shall stand, then it does seem to me that the amendment we adopted yesterday ought not to stand.

I thank the Senator for having yielded to me.

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. NEWLANDS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield, and to whom?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is somewhat irregular, I think, to make an argument upon an anticipated motion for reconsideration, and then make a condition in which those who are in favor of the amendment can not reply. I do not intend to interrupt the Senator from Utah by replying to the Senator from Missouri at this time, although I shall hope to have an opportunity to be heard if the motion to reconsider is made. I content myself at this time by saying there is no conflict whatsoever, in my opinion, between this amendment and any part of the Clayton bill, and especially is there no conflict between this amendment and that part of the Clayton bill last read by the Senator from Missouri. If the motion to reconsider is made I shall then expect to be heard upon it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I must decline to yield further.

Mr. PITTMAN. I simply desired to make a motion to reconsider, if the Senator will allow me, so as to throw this matter open to debate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think I should yield for that purpose. I expect to occupy only a few moments of time.

Mr. President, on yesterday I undertook to discuss somewhat in detail the provisions of the so-called trade commission bill, and to point out to the Senate wherein I thought those provisions were unfair in many particulars, and invalid in many particulars. I substantially completed what I had to say with reference to the bill, but yielded the floor for a motion to go into executive session.

At the time that motion was made I was discussing section 5 of the bill with reference to unfair competition; and I had said that if the language of the bill with reference to unfair competition were to be construed in one way the effect was to confer upon the trade commission judicial power, while if it were construed in the only other possible way that it could be construed, then it was open to the objection that it undertook to delegate legislative power. In other words, it seems to me that this section puts us upon the horns of a dilemma, and that it is void in either aspect.

The difference between judicial power and legislative power has been clearly defined by the courts and by law writers over and over again. There is no difficulty about the definition. There is sometimes some difficulty in determining whether or not the given case falls within or without the definition.

One of the best illustrations of a legitimate attempt to delegate the legislative power is the legislation creating the Interstate Commerce Commission and providing the powers which that commission shall exercise. The Congress of the United States in that legislation lays down a definite primary standard and gives to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power, not to inquire as to whether a law has been violated, but in effect to make subsidiary laws within the limits of the primary standard that has been laid down; and what the Interstate Commerce Commission does is to make a law to all intents and purposes.

I have said that that has been decided over and over again by the Supreme Court of the United States. Here is one decision, a comparatively recent one, in the case of Knoxville against Water Co., in Two hundred and twelfth United States. I refer to that decision because it deals with the general subject of devolving this character of power upon a body which is subsidiary to the legislative body.

At page 8 of that book the court said:

> The purpose of this suit is to arrest the operation of a law on the ground that it is void and of no effect. It happens that in this particular case it is not an act of the legislature that is attacked, but an ordinance of a municipality. Nevertheless the function of rate making is purely legislative in its character, and this is true, whether it is exercised directly by the legislature itself or by some subordinate or administrative body to whom the power of fixing rates in detail has been delegated. The completed act derives its authority from the legislature and must be regarded as an exercise of the legislative power.

What section 5 of the pending bill does is not to lay down a primary standard for the guidance of the interstate trade commission, but it is, first of all, to enact a law. The opening sentence is:

> That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful.

I am proceeding thus far upon the theory that the words "unfair competition" are to be given their legal meaning; that is, that in order to determine whether or not a case falls within the inhibition against unfair competition we are to resort to the decisions of the courts and the law writers, and that it is a legal question; that the inquiry is whether or not the acts which are complained of violate the provisions of the statute.

In that view, what is the commission directed to do? It is empowered and directed to prevent corporations from using unfair methods of competition. Thus far I am proceeding upon the theory that "unfair methods of competition" means the same as "unfair competition," which I think it does not. Then, the bill further directs that whenever the commission shall have reason to believe that any corporation has been or is using any unfair method of competition in commerce it shall issue its order directed to the supposedly offending parties, and bring those parties before the commission for an inquiry, and if the commission finds that the parties cited before it are engaged in doing things which, in the language of the bill, are "prohibited by this act, it"—the commission—"shall thereupon issue an order restraining and prohibiting the use of the same." Then the commission is given power at any time to modify or set aside the order which it has issued.

What power have we conferred upon that commission that is legislative in character? Here is a law which denounces as an offense, though no penalty may be attached to it, unfair competition. The commission inquires in a given case whether or not the corporation cited before it has been guilty of such acts as to constitute a violation of that law. The function of the commission in that view of that matter is not to make a subsidiary law or rule for the guidance of corporations in the future within the limits of the primary standard, but it is to ascertain whether an existing statute has been, in fact, violated, and if so to issue an order which to all intents and purposes is an injunction, the power to issue which is a judicial power, and can reside in the courts and nowhere else.

Now, after the commission has decided the case and issued its order restraining and prohibiting the corporation from the continuance of the practice in violation of the law, if the corporation has failed to comply the framers of this bill recognize that the commission could be given no power to enforce it. The power could not be given to cite these parties as for contempt. That much was realized. Therefore the power is not given to the commission to enforce its own order. But nevertheless it is in substance and effect a judicial order and not a legislative act. When the commission becomes satisfied that the order is not being complied with, then it is directed to bring the matter by a petition before a district court of the United States, and that court apparently, as a mere perfunctory matter, is authorized to issue an injunction to carry into effect the preceding injunction of the trade commission.

The fact that the order can not be made finally effective except by the interposition of the court will not prevent the prior proceedings of the commission from being in the nature of an exercise of the judicial power.

Here is a case recently decided by the Supreme Court of Illinois, reported in Two hundred and twelfth Illinois, at page 638. The syllabus of the case is as follows:

> Section 2 of act requiring landowners to clean streams is unconstitutional. Section 2 of the act for the protection and maintenance of ditches and streams (Laws of 1897, p. 206), which authorizes the tax assessor and county clerk to assess a penalty against landowners failing to clean streams, as required by section 1 of the act, is unconstitutional, as delegating judicial power to tax assessors and county clerks.

Now, I want to read briefly from that decision, because, as I read it, it bears upon exactly the condition that I have been making. At page 640:

> Under article 3 of the constitution—

That is, the constitution of Illinois—

> Under article 3 of the constitution the powers of the government of the State are divided into three distinct departments—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. Each of these departments has a well-defined and well-recognized function and power. The legislative department makes the laws, the executive department enforces them, and the judicial department interprets or construes them. The same section of the constitution which distributes the powers of government into these three classes also provides that no person or collection of persons, being one of these departments, shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others, except as afterwards expressly directed and permitted.

I may pause at that point to say there is no such provision as that in the Constitution of the United States, but it is there by necessary implication, because under the Constitution of the United States all the legislative power of the United States is conferred upon Congress; and all the legislative power being conferred upon Congress, it necessarily follows that any legislative power is denied to any other of the departments of government. So the Constitution provides that all judicial power is conferred upon the Supreme Court of the United States and such other courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish; and all the judicial power having been conferred upon the courts, it necessarily follows that any judicial power has been denied to any other department of the Government, and quite as effectually as if there had been an express provision to the effect; and that is the ruling of the courts upon that question.

Now, the opinion proceeds:

> Assessors of taxes and county clerks are ministerial officers, and while in some respects their acts may be construed as judicial, yet they are not judicial officers as that term is used in the constitution. They have no power to inflict penalties for violation of laws or to determine when a law has been violated and adjudge persons guilty. The statute in question imposed a duty upon persons owning land on the borders of certain streams. If the owner does not comply with the statute, he is to be punished. This punishment is not a tax imposed upon his land, but is a penalty for the violation of law. This is apparent from the wording of the statute, which expressly stated that a penalty shall be inflicted and that the amount assessed is to go into the school fund of the district. Before the property owner can be found guilty there are several things to be determined, namely, that the offense has been committed, that the offender is the owner of the land, that the stream or run is more than 15 feet wide and is not a river of the State; and the provisions of the act do not interfere with fencing, floodgates, bridges, culverts, etc. All of these questions must be determined before the penalty can be inflicted. They are clearly questions for determination by the judicial power of the State. To hold otherwise would be to permit the assessor to levy a penalty and deprive the offender of his property without due process of law, as provided in section 2 of article 2 of the constitution.

Now, I call particular attention to the concluding paragraph of this decision, which reads:

> It is no answer to say that the property owner can object to the tax in the county court and there have these questions judicially determined, for the reason that if the assessor has the power to impose the penalty and the county clerk has the power to extend the taxes, there is nothing left for the county court but to overrule the objection, as the question of violation has been previously determined by these officers.

That is precisely what happens under this bill. The commission, having determined that the given corporation has been guilty of such acts as constitute unfair competition, which is forbidden by the law of the land, proceeds to issue its order, and the function of the court is not to try that case de novo, to hear the evidence as to whether or not there has been a violation of the law of Congress, but to ascertain whether or not the order issued by the commission, which, as I say, in that view is a judicial decree, has been violated by the corporation; and having found that the corporation has violated the order, under this bill there is nothing for the court to do except to issue its injunctive order directing the corporation, in substance, to obey the order of the commission for the future.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Jones	Pittman	Swanson
Brady	Kenyon	Pomerene	Thomas
Brandegee	Kern	Reed	Thompson
Camden	Lane	Saulsbury	Thornton
Catron	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Tillman
Chamberlain	Lewis	Sheppard	Vardaman
Colt	Martine, N. J.	Shields	Walsh
Crawford	Nelson	Simmons	Weeks
Culberson	Newlands	Smith, Ariz.	West
Cummins	Norris	Smith, Ga.	White
Gallinger	O'Gorman	Smith, Md.	Williams
Gronna	Overman	Smoot
Hollis	Page	Sterling
Hughes	Perkins	Sutherland

Mr. TILLMAN. I was asked by the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] to announce that they are unavoidably absent on public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Utah will proceed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if what I have said thus far about this section 5 is not correct, namely, if the words "unfair competition" do not mean the same as "unfair methods of competition," and the words "unfair competition" are not to be given their legal meaning, then it would follow that the commission is given the power to go beyond the legal meaning of the term and to declare practices as unfair competition which the law does not declare to be unfair competition, and to construe the words "unfair competition" in some popular or colloquial sense. When it does that and proceeds to issue an order, proceeds to declare the practices constitute unfair competition in some popular meaning of that expression, then it is making a law, and before it can be permitted to do that legally there must be in the congressional act a primary standard laid down which will limit, and clearly limit, the boundaries within which the commission must proceed to legislate.

It is self-evident that if the commission is permitted to declare as unfair competition any practices which it may think to be unfair competition, then there is no standard laid down in this law, because in that view of it the words "unfair competition" include everything which anybody charged with responsibility upon this commission may in his mind think to be unfair competition, and no business man can tell, even approximately, in advance whether the thing he is about to do will constitute a violation of law or not, because the law has not been made and its limits have not been defined by a congressional act. The law is not in existence until the commission has evolved it from the inner consciousness of its members—from their peculiar ethical views or their prejudices or from some other attribute of their minds.

Mr. President, I emphasize this and repeat it to some extent because I regard the proposition which I am making as absolutely fatal to the validity to this section 5.

Mr. REED. If it will not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly not.

Mr. REED. The Senator used the expression, as nearly as I can quote it, "the law is not in existence until it is evolved by the commission." Now, law implies a rule of conduct. Is there anything in the bill as it now stands providing that when the commission has once decided a matter it shall then constitute a rule of conduct? Are we not relegated to simply this: The commission in each individual case, following the light of its own conscience, shall decide that particular case accordingly as it may at that particular moment feel?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, yes. The Senator is entirely correct in that statement. In that view of it, the commission may make a rule to-day governing a particular corporation and may make an entirely different rule to-morrow governing another corporation, or it might make even a different rule to-morrow for the same corporation that it had imposed its rule upon to-day. There is no boundary whatever prescribed in this proposed statute.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, I was trying to draw the distinction between the commission, under this broad and general power, sitting down and writing and promulgating a series of rules and then undertaking to say they should be followed, this at least furnishing a rule of the commission, and the mere decision of the commission in particular cases, which I think is a very broad distinction.

I wanted to get the Senator's view on this point: Suppose the Congress of the United States was to say in this bill, "the commission is hereby authorized to pass such rules and regulations as it shall see fit for the government of the business of the United States, and shall have the power to prescribe that which is lawful and that which is unlawful," can the Senator doubt that that would be an express delegation or an attempt to delegate legislative authority?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. REED. If they can not make a rule general in its nature, how can it be held that they can issue a decree specific in its character?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think, Mr. President, that it can not be done. That has been the burden of my argument all the way through.

Mr. REED. I understand that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me, before the Senator from Connecticut interrupts, say that the Senator from Missouri was not in yesterday when I read some vague laws that had met with the condemnation of the courts, and among others I read a provision of the Chinese Penal Code, which, I think, is practically parallel with this proposed legislation. I think the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] is probably deeply learned in the Chinese laws and is saturated with the learning and philosophy out of which those laws have grown. I think he must have had this very provision before him when he came to draw this bill, because it presents so precise a parallel. Let me read it:

> Whoever is guilty of improper conduct and of such as is contrary to the spirit of the law, though not a breach of any specific part of it, shall be punished at least 40 blows.

Then, notice this, which the Chinese legislators inserted for fear some person might escape or should not receive sufficient punishment under the rather narrow rule that they had laid down. They proceeded:

> And when the impropriety is of a serious nature, with 80 blows.

I shall expect, if this law goes into operation and shall be upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States, that we shall be called upon some time in the future to pass upon a proposed law of that character, because if we can pass this bill containing the unfair-competition provision and it can be upheld, there is no reason why we should not pass a more general law and, once for all, take from our shoulders the burden and responsibility of ourselves making laws.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The bill, as the Senator from Utah knows, provides in reference to the orders which the commission may issue:

> The commission may at any time modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any order issued by it under this act.

So they can order a man to do a thing to-day or find a thing to be an unfair method of competition to-day and to-morrow they can change it. They can order one man to desist from an unfair method of competition and they can allow another man to persist in it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There is no provision that whatever order they make shall be uniform and shall bear upon all alike.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, they become the practical censors of public business morality, issuing their edicts from time to time and withdrawing them from time to time as may agree with their peculiar notions of the moment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And they can play their pets and favorites and punish those whom they do not like.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Georgia, if he desires to interrupt me.

Mr. WEST. It would be the case that upon the same statement of facts they could punish one and let the other go scot free?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think undoubtedly so. I do not see how it can be avoided under this provision of the proposed law.

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] a little while ago called attention to an amendment which we adopted on yesterday, which some of us strenuously opposed, but which was voted into the bill notwithstanding, and he showed that that amendment would conflict with certain provisions of the so-called Clayton antitrust bill; as I remember, that it would conflict with more than one provision of that bill. That illustrates what I have said heretofore, that these three bills to a large extent overlap each other, and, dealing with the same subject, ought to be considered together. Considering each of them separately, we are sure to put into one or the other of the bills haphazard provisions of this character which will conflict with provisions in the other bills as they come up.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. I also call the Senator's attention to the fact that the provision in the Clayton bill as reported to the Senate is in harmony with the provisions upon that subject in the interstate-commerce law, while the amendment offered yesterday as to similar proceedings is in direct conflict with those measures.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes. It is not fair to the business interests of this country that we should proceed to legislate in this way. The fair thing and the wise thing would be to take these three bills, or at least two of them, the so-called Clayton bill and the unfair competition bill, and refer them back to the Committees on the Judiciary and Interstate Commerce to act jointly on them, and then for Congress to adjourn and go home and let this whole question be thrashed out by those committees; let these provisions be reconciled; let these bills be dovetailed together, so that they will be harmonious one with the other and so that these many provisions, which I predict will be incapable of enforcement, or, rather, will not be enforced or will be enforced arbitrarily or will be held invalid by the courts, may be eliminated. If we will do that, we will be doing far more good for the country than we will to sit here, after all of us are tired out, when our brains are not operating as they ought to operate and as they would operate after a season of rest. We would be doing far more good for the country if we were to adjourn and let these bills be taken care of by those two committees and then be brought into the Senate at the incoming session in December. Then we would get some legislation that would mean something.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. Would it not also be of benefit to give the country the opportunity to find out just what is in these bills and have an opportunity to give expression to its views with reference to them independently?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I want to call attention to the fact that under date of June 5 of this year (calendar day, June 6) Senate bill 4160, a bill to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes, was reported by Mr. NEWLANDS with amendments. Then on June 13, six or seven days afterwards, House bill 15613 was reported, containing section 5. Section 5, which we are now discussing, was not in the bill at all as reported on June 6. So the first intimation which we had of any subject covered by section 5 came out in the bill as reported on June 13.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is correct, Mr. President. I venture to say that the business men of the country generally do not understand what is in these various bills, and particularly that they do not understand what is in the unfair-competition bill. They ought to understand that; we ought to get their point of view before we can intelligently act upon such legislation.

Mr. President, the original Sherman Antitrust Act was before Congress, as I remember, something like two years before it was finally acted upon. It was brought into the Senate and discussed day after day for a long time; amendments were proposed to it; some amendments were adopted, and after the bill had all been thrashed out—a statute like that, which was simple as compared with this trade-commission bill—after all that had been done, the Senate as then constituted saw the wisdom of sending the bill to another committee; and they sent it to the Committee on the Judiciary, from which it finally emerged in an altogether different shape, in many respects from the bill as it had been considered in the Senate. That is the way that body of men proceeded, because they did not want to pass any haphazard legislation; they took their time about it. Is the country going to suffer if the Newlands bill is not passed this week? Is anybody going to suffer if we take the time until next December to consider it? I see the Senator from Nevada is upon his feet, and I should like him to tell us.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wanted to ask a question or two of the Senator, if he will permit me.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very well.

Mr. NEWLANDS. In the first place, I wish to ask the Senator whether he believes in any form of a trade commission, or whether he has any definite view as to how that trade commission should be constituted, and what functions it should perform?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I am not certain that I believe in any form of a trade commission, but it is sufficient for my purpose now to say that I do not believe in the trade commission proposed by the pending bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then, with reference to this bill, has the Senator as yet proposed any amendments to it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I recognize the utter futility of presenting amendments to this bill. I have called attention to what I consider to be very clear incongruities in it, and if the Senator from Nevada thinks I am right I know that an amendment offered by him will stand a far better chance of adoption than any offered by me.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state, Mr. President, that it is my purpose to look over very carefully all the amendments that are presented to this bill and present them to the committee before the bill is finally reported to the Senate. I am very desirous of receiving any suggestions from Members of the Senate regarding it. The bill in the committee was not considered in any partisan way; both Republicans and Democrats participated in its framing, and it is in no sense to be regarded as a partisan measure. The bill is comparatively simple in its framework.

Now, I should like to know, first, whether the Senator, for instance, believes that it is wise to give such a trade commission any powers of investigation over corporations engaged in interstate commerce, and, second, whether or not he thinks it is wise to enable this commission to be of aid to the courts in the preparation of decrees of dissolution, and, third, whether he thinks it desirable that this commission, if in its investigation it finds the antitrust laws being violated, should report to the Attorney General its findings?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator is asking me a great many questions, and I am afraid I will not be able to bear them all in mind.

Mr. NEWLANDS. All these are simple matters, and if the bill is not perfect in these particulars, or has any defect, I would be very glad if the Senator would suggest amendments and give us the benefit of his knowledge and experience. I am sure there is no lawyer in this body who would be listened to with greater respect than would the Senator from Utah.

What I would like to avoid is simply the assertion of critical faculties with reference to this bill; I should like to see the constructive faculties of those who are opposed to it employed in such a practical way as to give us the benefit of their suggestions, so that we can accept them if they are wise.

The bill itself, as I have said, is a very simple one, it seems to me, except so far perhaps as section 5 is concerned. There has been some discussion about the indefiniteness of the rule laid down there as to unfair competition. If the Senator would prefer that the offenses constituting unfair competition should be specifically stated, I am sure that we would value an amendment from him that would specifically state the unfair practices which he thought ought to be inquired into and condemned by the trade commission; and it is possible that such an enumeration might be made in the bill, together with a basket clause——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Similar to the Chinese basket clause which I have read.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Together with a basket clause covering unfair competition either with or without the specific enumeration. I am not at all dismayed by the suggestion of the Senator that this legislation is rather of a Chinese character. I am sure that the words "unfair competition" present no greater complications than were presented by numerous words which have been employed in legal phraseology, such as "undue," "unreasonable," "reasonable care," or the phrase itself "restraint of trade"; but if the Senator desires really to reach this evil and would suggest to the Senate a better and more definite way of reaching it by an amendment, I am sure we would be very glad to consider it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I, perhaps, ought not to have characterized this proposed law as a Chinese law; I did not quite mean to do that; but I think the Senator from Nevada must agree with me that many of the expressions and the general scope of the bill might be described as oriental imagery, to some extent.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The charge, then, will extend to the Supreme Court and to the other courts of the United States, which in their decrees have employed the term "unfair competition" again and again, and not only in the decrees but in decisions, as having a definite significance.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The courts have very frequently said in their decisions that certain conduct was improper conduct; but does the Senator from Nevada think that a statute passed by Congress denouncing improper conduct would be a valid statute that the courts could lay hold of and enforce? The fact that the courts have used some expression does not make that expression so definite that it can be used in the framing of a statute.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; but it seems to me that when a court in its decree forbids a defendant from engaging in "any other form of unfair competition," the court must have a pretty clear idea of what "unfair competition" is and what it will embrace, and that the court can hardly be charged with imitating the Chinese in the matter of their phraseology.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In a moment I will yield to the Senator. Can the Senator from Nevada call my attention to any case where a court has issued a decree enjoining "unfair competition"?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. By that description and nothing more?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can. Such an instance has been referred to in the argument of this case, and later on I will refer the Senator to one.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I will undertake to say that the Senator can not find any such decree, because such a decree would be manifestly void; it would be a decree no better than one enjoining the defendant from improper conduct. An injunction must tell the defendant what acts he must refrain from doing; it must not tell him in the language of a legal conclusion, but it must tell him in the language of fact what he must refrain from doing. Perhaps it may be true that an injunction has been issued enjoining the defendant from doing certain things, describing them, and then containing a general clause enjoining him from "other methods of unfair competition"; but that, of course, would be construed in connection with the preceding language and would be limited to the character of acts which were described in the detailed portion of the decree. No decree, however, would stand for one moment which would be couched in the language of this law, that the defendant "is restrained and enjoined from practicing unfair competition." If that was all of it, of course it would not stand.

I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I merely wanted to ask the Senator from Nevada, the chairman of the committee, if there had been any hearings before the committee with respect to section 5, and especially with respect to the insertion of the words "unfair competition"? In the case of the Clayton bill I am aware that business men were asked to appear and testify as to the several provisions of that bill relating to discrimination in price, "tying" contracts, holding companies, and interlocking directorates. I wanted to ask if the business men of the country have been heard with respect to this new and indefinite phrase, "unfair competition"?

I am profoundly impressed with the view that our legislation should conform to the business usages and practices of the country, and that that should be our aim. If we have passed through a period where there have been sudden economic and industrial changes, then we should call upon the business men of the country to state how far they desire these changes to be incorporated into statute law.

In other words, our attitude toward the business of the country where great changes have taken place in the methods of business should be constructive and not wholly remedial or destructive. If, for instance, the principle of cooperation, as opposed to the principle of extreme competition, has become a tendency of modern economic and industrial development in this country and throughout the civilized world, and business men have recognized it, it is the duty of Congress to recognize this fact in making changes in the law.

I remember reading a speech of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], in which he said that the tendency toward cooperation existed practically in every civilized nation in the world. If that is a fact, I would approach legislation from the standpoint of recognizing this tendency; in other words, from the standpoint of construction rather than destruction, and in so far as this tendency or principle is recognized by the business men of the country I would incorporate it into the law of the land. In other words, if that principle has become a part of the custom, usage, and practice of the best business men of the country, it should be recognized.

I did not intend to wander, Mr. President. I merely want to know what the business men of this country think of this phrase "unfair competition," which is new in the sense in which it is now used. I want to know what they think of it and how they are going to meet it if it is incorporated into law. I do not think the law should originate in the mind of some lawyer or group of lawyers in this body who may believe that certain changes in the law will meet and correct certain evils. That is not the way to approach this class of legislation.

Therefore I think we should all hesitate, in justice to the business men of the country, before incorporating these words into the law of the land. The prosperity of the country depends upon the business men. It is what they want, not what we want, that should be the law. We are in the field of customary law, and customary law has always been the custom and usages of the people. I think it would be dangerous if we should now incorporate this phrase into the law without at least giving the business men of this country a hearing.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, of course I do not wish to take up the Senator's time, but the Senator from Rhode Island put a query to me.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator says we should hesitate about this legislation. We have been hesitating for many years, and we have hesitated long enough. We have been having hearings upon this subject, both in the Senate and in the House, for years. The phrase "unfair competition" has become such a general phrase that in 1911, when I introduced the first trade commission bill, I provided for a commission that should restrain unfair competition. It had significance then among economists and among business men, and it had a legal significance then, and it has now.

The Senator inquires whether we have consulted the merchants of the country and the business men of the country. Look over the records of both the House and the Senate and observe the voluminous hearings that have been held upon this subject, in all of which unfair competition has been dealt with as an element in our economic life, a phrase perfectly understood by the business men of the country, understood by economists, and understood by the courts, as expressed in their decisions and in their decrees.

The time for hesitation, it seems to me, has gone by. The time for legislation is now upon us; and what I am asking is the helpful aid of the critics of this bill in constructive amendments that will perfect it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Washington. Then I must resume the floor, for fear the statute of limitations will run against me.

Mr. JONES. I just wanted to ask the Senator from Nevada whether or not there was any provision similar to this relating to unfair competition in Senate bill 4160, introduced by the Senator, when it was introduced, or whether there was any such provision in it when it was reported to the Senate? I have examined it hastily, and I have been unable to find any provision anything like section 5 of the bill which we are now considering.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can not identify these bills by number. The Senator asks about Senate bill 4160?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; there is not.

Mr. JONES. That is the trade commission bill introduced by the Senator on January 22, and reported by him to the Senate with amendments on June 5.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is true.

Mr. JONES. So that neither the bill as introduced nor the bill as reported contains any provision similar to section 5 of this bill?

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is true.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator should file a disclaimer of any purpose to avoid the statute of limitations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I realize that it is almost forcing senatorial courtesy unduly to ask the Senator from Utah to yield; but the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] has asked a very pertinent question. He asks whether the business men of this country have been heard as to section 5 of this bill, as to what they think "unfair competition" means, and whether they want it prohibited in those words.

Mr. President, I take it upon myself to say that no such provision as that was in the bill which the Senator who is the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee himself introduced.

No such provision as that was in the bill which our committee reported to the Senate. That provision is a part of a bill known in the House as the Stevens bill. Without any hearing whatsoever before the Committee on Interstate Commerce it was taken by one of the members, after the bill had been completed by the committee and it was ready to report, and was engrafted upon this bill, with not one single witness having testified before the committee in relation to it. The discussion upon it in the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce did not consume 20 minutes The yeas and nays were called, and it was voted right on. That is the history of section 5.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I must refuse to yield for a moment. I will yield the floor in a very short time.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17041) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17041) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 45 and 91.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 138 and 146; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "The President is authorized from time to time, as the exigencies of the service may require, to rearrange, by consolidation or otherwise, the several customs-collection districts and to discontinue ports of entry by abolishing the same or establishing others in their stead: Provided, That the whole number of customs-collection districts, ports of entry, or either of them, shall at no time be made to exceed those now established and authorized except as the same may hereafter be provided by law: Provided further, That hereafter the collector of customs of each customs-collection district shall be officially designated by the number of the district for which he is appointed and not by the name of the port where the headquarters are situated, and the President is authorized from time to time to change the location of the headquarters in any customs-collection district as the needs of the service may require: And provided further, That the President shall, at the beginning of each regular session, submit to Congress a statement of all acts, if any, done hereunder and the reasons therefor"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 92, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "For the administration and improvement of Glacier National Park, Mont., the construction of roads, trails, bridges, and telephone lines and the repair thereof, including the construction of a road, together with the necessary bridges and culverts, from the old town of St. Mary; thence in a general northerly and westerly direction through that part of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation east of lower St. Mary Lake to a point in or near section 35, township 36 north, range 15 west, on the boundary line between the Glacier National Park and the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, $75,000. The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to accept patented lands or rights of way over patented lands in the Glacier National Park that may be donated for park purposes (acts May 11, 1910, vol. 36, p. 354, secs. 1 and 2; June 23, 1913, vol. 38, p. 49, sec. 17)"; and the Senate agree to the same.

THOMAS S. MARTIN,
LEE S. OVERMAN,
GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
SWAGAR SHERLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Virginia what has become of the amendment of the Senate striking out the provision in the bill relating to passes and other favors for the officers of the Interstate Commerce Commission engaged in making physical valuations of railroads?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That amendment is not involved in the present report. It was disposed of some days ago in a previous report that was adopted. A partial report was made on the bill some four or five days ago, and that matter was disposed of at that time and is not involved in the present report.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask how it was disposed of? I was not present at the time.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. My recollection is that the views of the Senator from Iowa were not adopted.

Mr. CUMMINS. And that we have made it lawful for the railroad companies to give passes and other courtesies to Government officials?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. We have not. That was not done. It has been some days ago since the report was adopted and my memory may not be exactly correct. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa provided for authority for modified agreements—for special rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; my amendment was one striking out the entire provision and providing quite another arrangement, so that the Government would pay fair compensation for the service rendered.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It may have gone in. My memory does not serve me about the matter at the moment. It was disposed of some days ago, however, and is not involved in this report.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not in this report?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. No; it is not in this report at all.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia a question so that I may understand clearly the disposition made of the amendment adopted by the Senate with respect to changes in the customs districts. I am not entirely sure that I understood the report. I will ask the Senator if it is a correct understanding that the President is by this provision given power and authority to rearrange the customs districts in such a way as he deems best but without authority to increase the number.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, that is correct. The amendment which was agreed on as a substitute for the Senate amendment gives the President power to rearrange the customs districts just so that the number now in existence be not increased.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, of course I shall not attempt to antagonize the report made. The conferees, I am sure, have done the best they could in the circumstances. But I do not see that it accomplishes the purpose had in mind when the amendments referred to were placed on the bill by the Senate. There was opposition to those amendments, coming, as I am informed, from a source that ought to have been more modest in urging it than it was. This opposition is largely from States in which the total customs collections are about one-eighth, I think something less than one-eighth, the collections annually made in Kansas City. Why the representatives of States at whose ports all told only about $80,000 are collected annually and at an outlay in the nature of expenses of nearly 50 per cent of that sum should object to so arranging or rearranging the customs districts that a great city like Kansas City, the central point of an important tributary territory, and where eight or nine times as much revenue is collected at about the same or at less expense than in the States where $80,000 is collected, is somewhat mystifying to me.

The fact is, Mr. President, that Kansas City under the present arrangement is a subport. There are large importations into that city. It is a very important commercial point. More revenue is collected in Kansas City than in any other port between the Mississippi River, at St. Louis, for example, and San Francisco on the Pacific coast, with the possible exception—and I am not sure as to that—of St. Paul and Minneapolis. Not only is more collected at Kansas City than at any other port in that vast region lying between the Mississippi and the Pacific, but two and three times as much, with one or two exceptions, as is collected at any other port in that great territory.

The practical difficulty is that the merchants of Kansas City in importing goods and the transaction of business before the officials in charge of the port often find difficulty in adjusting differences that arise, and the deputy is not empowered to adjust them, but they are compelled to go 300 miles to the collector at the headquarters of the district, and there take up the questions of difference that arise, involving expense and annoyance and delay. I think it is exceedingly unjust and subject to criticism that such conditions should exist.

Mr. President, I can not see under this provision that any relief can be afforded in the case of Kansas City or in the case of Florida upon which the junior Senator from that State addressed the Senate when it was before us here. I see no door opening for relief. You can not increase the number of the districts. So you can not establish a collector of customs where a collector is actually needed without discontinuing one already established or consolidating it with one already existing. That, of course, would precipitate a contest before the President that would make it altogether unlikely that it would occur.

I am very sorry that this limitation has been put in this form, but I suppose there is nothing for me to do except to yield without contest to the action taken by the conferees. However, I do protest against it as working a gross injustice.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri made an exceedingly strong case for an additional custom district with headquarters at Kansas City, but the best the conferees could do with the House conferees was to make it possible for the President to accomplish that result by abolishing some of the inconsequential customs districts. There is no doubt about the fact that there are quite a number that are of little consequence and which might be abolished without any detriment to the public service.

The amendment as agreed on by the conferees gives the President the power to abolish one or more of the inconsequential districts and to create new districts where they are urgently needed. I believe under this amendment a result ought to be accomplished which will meet the views of the Senator from Missouri. In any event it was the best we could arrange for.

Mr. STONE. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will say to the Senator if there was any Representative or Senator from any particular State antagonizing this amendment of his I was not advised of it. I was advised by the House conferees that there are a large number of new districts desired, and if they allowed an increase in the aggregate number of districts it would open the door and the creation of these two, one for Florida and the other for Missouri, would be followed by new districts in other parts of the country. They would not agree to anything that permitted any increase in the aggregate number, but under the arrangement, as I stated, it is believed that the President can in the exercise of the discretion given him abolish some of the inconsequential districts and create new districts in important places like those in Missouri and Florida.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to join in what my colleague [Mr. STONE] has said, and simply to remark that the claims not only of Kansas City but of a vast territory lying west of it which does its business through that port have been presented with all the force that my colleague and myself could bring to bear. The Senate conferees, I am satisfied, have done all they can do at this time. I am fearful that no genuine relief will result. It may be that the President will find the means of solving the difficulty and of equalizing conditions. If that is not done, we will have to trust to a future Congress perhaps to rectify the evil.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I want to emphasize the fact that the chairman of the committee, as well as the other members of the conference committee on the part of the Senate, always stand firmly for all amendments placed on appropriation bills by the Senate.

No outside parties, so far as I know, have interfered with conference committees in their work. Certainly no person ever approached me; but I have followed the chairman in his earnest endeavor to secure what the Senate has thought proper and desirable. I chance to know that the chairman and his associates on the conference committee did all in their power to secure what they thought was justice to Kansas City, which is a great commercial center.

But it must be remembered that when the Senate conferees are met with the statement on the part of the House conferees that they will not agree to what the Senate asks, the Senate conferees must of necessity yield, as they did in this case.

As I understand, the Senate conferees were assured that in all human probability the matter could be adjusted by the President by dropping one or more inconsequential collectorships, and in that way secure relief to Kansas City and to Florida. I hope that in that way the desired result will be accomplished.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to add one word, and I wish to say that one word that I may not be misunderstood. I have not meant to say that Representatives or Senators have approached the conference committee or conferees to oppose the amendments put on the bill to which I have referred; but I do know with such reasonable certainty that I am justified in asserting it as a fact that influences in some quarters were exerted very strenuously on some gentlemen to prevent any reformation in the organization of the customs districts. That is what I had reference to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, we have drifted so far away from the series of questions which were submitted to me some time ago by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] that I am afraid that I can not recall precisely what they were. The Senator from Nevada, however, seems to think that no harm could possibly result from the bill. Nobody admires the clean and wholesome optimism of that Senator more than I do. He is not appalled in the presence of any sort of impending disaster. If he had been on earth at the time of the French Revolution he would have regarded that bloody business as though it were a perfectly peaceful and harmonious proceeding at The Hague. He thinks the bill is a simple bill. His philosophical and intellectual horizon is so broad that things which most of us regard as exceedingly complicated to the Senator from Nevada are exceedingly simple. So I am not weakened in my view of this bill by the way in which the senior Senator from Nevada regards it.

The Senator wants to know what specific things in the bill I am opposed to and how I would remedy them by constructive legislation. Mr. President, I have been attempting for several hours to point out the particular things I do object to, and I think if the Senator from Nevada will take the trouble to analyze what I have said he will find that I object to pretty nearly everything in the bill. If I had my way about it, I would simply strike out all after the enacting clause and then drop the enacting clause into the wastebasket. I think that would be the best disposition to make of this measure.

The Senator wants to know whether I think this commission ought not to be made an aid to the courts. Mr. President, I do not. I think the courts are quite capable of taking care of themselves. What an absurdity it is, when we come to reflect upon it, that we should set up here a legislative commission for the purpose of preparing decrees for a court.

Mr. President, when a case is brought before a judge he hears all the testimony and he is in a better situation to determine what form the decree should take than some outside board of administrative officers who have not been familiar with the litigation, and who must take it up again at first hand.

I have no doubt the courts are quite capable of selecting their own masters in chancery if the interposition of such an officer is necessary in any proceeding before them. I am inclined to think that the courts will resent, as I think they ought to resent, any attempt upon the part of the legislative branch of this Government to establish a commission as an aid to the court to prepare its decrees, to act as its master in chancery. The courts are not bound to accept any such appointee as that, and I think they will decline to accept, as I think they ought to do, any such appointee.

The Senator wants to know whether I think they ought not to be made an aid to the Attorney General. I think they ought not to be. There are three branches of our Government established by the Constitution. There is the legislative branch; there is the judicial branch; and there is the executive department. It is the peculiar function of the executive department to see that the laws are enforced. That is why we appoint an Attorney General at the head of a vast force of skilled and learned men—district attorneys in every State and every district of the Union, with their assistants. Can not the Attorney General with that great force of lawyers at his command see that any infraction of the law is properly investigated and prosecuted?

Why do we need to create a commission to help the Attorney General perform his duties?

I am opposed to the bill from the beginning of it to the end of it, with its arbitrary powers, with its absurd requirements, among others, that every corporation in this country, numbering anywhere from 300,000 to a half million, must, apparently for all time to come, preserve every document and every paper that happens to have something in it relating to interstate commerce; that it must pile up that vast quantity of useless rubbish, because perhaps some time or other this prying commission may want to inspect some of its papers.

Mr. President, the Senate is in no condition to pass wisely and intelligently upon this measure. It should receive far greater consideration both at the hands of the Senate and at the hands of the country than it has yet received before we are in a position to act upon it.

The great difficulty, the underlying difficulty, in the whole matter of this proposed antitrust legislation is that the Congress of the United States under this administration has ceased to be an independent and coordinate department of the Government and has become a mere annex of the executive department of the Government. Will any Senator rise here and tell me one great piece of constructive legislation, one important piece of legislation of any character, beyond the appropriation bills, that has been originated in Congress? Congress sits here supinely doing nothing of its own initiative of any consequence, waiting for the word from the White House before it takes any step in legislative matters, and then legislates according to the behest from the White House.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I decline to yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah declines to yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We had in the early part of the Congress the tariff bill to consider. The Senators know that a very large number of Senators and Members of the House did not believe in putting sugar upon the free list; that they did not believe in putting wool upon the free list. Some of them said so. Yet because the order had gone forth from the Executive that the sugar industry of the country must be slaughtered and that wool must be put upon the free list legislation was enacted accordingly.

The Democratic Party had declared in favor of opening the Panama Canal to the ships of our country free of tolls. The Democratic Party had registered its opinion in favor of that policy by an overwhelming vote in both Houses of Congress, but at the crack of the Executive whip that policy was reversed, and we found ourselves in the humiliating condition of having yielded an American right to a British opinion.

And so with this legislation. The President has declared that trust legislation must be enacted at this session, and so it must be put through, whether it is wise to do so or not.

Mr. President, I hope the time will come, and I am sure it will come within a year or two, when another party will be in control of this Congress and of the White House, and I must content myself for the present by looking forward to that time when Congress will again resume its normal functions and legislate in accordance with its views and not in accordance merely with the views of another equal and coordinate, but not controlling, branch of the Government.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall not unduly prolong the discussion of this measure. I would be very glad to permit it to go to a vote without saying anything further upon it, but my views concerning it seem to be out of harmony with the majority of the Senators upon this side of the Chamber, and I have so much respect for their opinions and am so reluctant to occupy any position which is not in harmony with them that I feel it my duty to give some of the reasons why in my judgment this legislation is undesirable and undemocratic, for I believe that both these objections can be urged against it.

I shall not spend much time in a discussion of the contents of the bill, because that has been done very exhaustively by others and much more ably than I could expect to do it.

I am convinced, Mr. President, that, so far as the right of Congress to legislate against unfair competition is concerned, it has that power. The arguments of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] have removed the original objections which seemed to me conclusive against legislation of so general a character. But the exhaustive investigation which these gentlemen have made of the subject, the great number of authorities, not only from our own but from other countries, sustaining their contention, on the one hand, coupled with the extreme difficulty of specifically defining the widespread evil against which legislation is demanded, would in all probability make it extremely dangerous to attempt to limit the evil of unfair competition to specific instances. But that very circumstance, Mr. President, is an argument against the enactment of such legislation by the use of a general description unless the need of it is overwhelming, because whenever a general statement of that sort is crystallized into a statute it necessarily imposes upon the courts of the country the added duty of applying their own definitions to the facts of particular cases and thus judicially defining what is and what is not "unfair competition."

We would have, then, a law of unfair competition consisting of the general provision of the statute, together with innumerable decisions declaring certain given acts to be or not to be an infraction of its prohibition. These in time will arouse the ingenuity of those who desire to evade both the statute and the decisions, thus presenting new and different combinations of fact from time to time for judicial solution, so that the statute may never become sufficiently explicit by judicial construction to carry out and subserve the purpose for which it was intended. My objection to it, therefore, is emphasized rather than removed by the fact that it is within the power of Congress to so legislate.

Mr. President, in that connection, and lest I should overlook it, I want to emphasize the fact that the bill which we are here considering is not the bill which passed the other House, but is reported by our committee as the House bill. A great deal has been said about the recommendation of the President concerning this particular topic of legislation, and contrasts have been drawn between what he then said and his utterances upon the same subject on previous occasions, the object, of course, being to establish a contradiction, a different position, a departure from one attitude and the adoption of another, and thus discredit the legislation, if not the President. I think one Senator said last week, in referring to this bill, that it would doubtless command the support of the Democratic side of the Chamber, because it was the President's wish that this bill should be enacted.

Whatever may be said of the attitude of the Executive with reference to the House bill, certainly there has been no expression, so far as my knowledge goes, either official or unofficial, from the White House concerning the merits of the bill reported here, and which is now the unfinished business of the Senate; but without regard to this, the objections, which seem to me to be fundamental to the bill, must determine my course concerning it.

Mr. President, the Senator who has just taken his seat [Mr. SUTHERLAND] took occasion to echo and repeat what has been stated here so many times from the other side of the Chamber, that we were here for the purpose of enacting legislation for which the country was not prepared, which the country really does not demand, which is ill-considered, and which, if enacted in its present shape, may produce more harm than benefit, simply because an edict from the White House has been issued which so concludes the Democratic majority of this body as to cause it to stay here under protest to enact legislation of which it does not fully approve. This reproach—for I think I am justified in so calling it—is not of recent origin. It has been repeated and re-repeated from the other side of the Chamber ever since the special session of this Congress convened in April of last year. We have been taunted with having surrendered our initiative, with having abandoned our constitutional functions, and with acting as automatons under the supine control of a coordinate branch of the Government. This is true neither in fact nor in appearance.

Mr. President, those who sent us here; those who make and express public opinion; those whose needs require legislation at the hands of the National Congress; those who understand and are in sympathy with the President of the United States approve his action and ask no explanation for our conduct. They know and we know that the President of the United States is peculiarly the representative of the people. They look to him to interpret and supply their needs. He is the only official for whom all the people vote; he is held responsible for what Congress does or fails to do; he is given credit for whatever is popular either in legislation or administration, and he is blamed for whatever is unpopular in legislation or administration. If we by our conduct here fail to meet the approbation of the people, it is the occupant of the White House who bears the blame. If our conduct here is such as to command the popular approbation, it is the administration which receives and should receive the credit. The President of the United States is becoming more and more the center of the people's hope, a he is becoming more and more the object of the people's criticism; and just as he measures up to public demand; just as he exhibits the courage that is essential to the discharge of public duty; just as he perceives and assumes the responsibility of his great office, will he command the confidence and receive the support of the people; and just in proportion as he fails to measure up to those standards will he fall in public estimation. He is the leader of the people, the interpreter of their needs, the spokesman of their cause. They do not reproach him for urging us to remain at our post of duty until our task shall have been accomplished. They commend us when we respond to his appeals and give him the encouragement both of unlimited confidence and hearty support.

Who are the great Presidents of the United States, beginning with Washington and ending with Woodrow Wilson? Precisely those, Mr. President, who, recognizing the public needs, and keeping in touch with the public conscience, have stamped their individuality and their influence upon national legislation; those who, perceiving the need of a given policy, have had the courage to advise and to direct it; those who have prompted Congress to the performance of their duties as outlined in their public declarations and as demanded by the public needs; those who have proven their claim to leadership by wisely and courageously asserting it. We need but name Andrew Jackson, Abraham Lincoln, Theodore Roosevelt, and Woodrow Wilson as types of those Presidents who, keeping close to popular sentiment, have counseled wise and needed legislative reforms, and have commanded, because they have earned, the popular approval.

Mr. President, I glory in the fact that the President of the United States knows what the people want, communicates with Congress upon subjects of national concern, and reminds its Members of the duty which rests upon them, and calls upon them to perform it. The President, in calling our attention to needed legislation, keeping us in communion both with what we were elected to accomplish and what popular opinion demands, is always abreast of the times. He is abreast with but never behind the people, and bears with serene composure that criticism and denunciation which pronounces him a tyrant and a usurper and which reproaches a Democratic Congress for complying with and conforming to a common purpose. It is a happy circumstance, Mr. President, that we have a ruler who knows how to rule, and a leader who does not hesitate to lead. Such a man I for one am willing to follow and to aid as my poor abilities will permit in the observance of a common duty. We have had Presidents of the United States who have been unequal to these supreme requirements. Presidents who have misinterpreted popular sentiment and ran counter to the declarations upon which they were elected; and, Mr. President, the people, always just, have never failed to relegate such Executives to the oblivion which they have justly earned.

So long as the President of the United States keeps in close contact with the people, so long as he seeks to interpret and obey the popular expression of the popular will, so long as he leads in the development of needed legislation for the popular good, just so long will the people sustain and just so long will the Democratic Congress commend and follow him. Thus far he has kept the faith and shows no signs of weariness in well-doing.

Had the last President of the United States exhibited those qualities of courage, of command, and of leadership which have justly and highly distinguished his predecessor and his successor possibly the Senator from Utah would not have been obliged a few moments ago to express the hope that his party might again come into power, for it doubtless would have remained in power; but I beg to assure the Senator that whatever the fate of this bill may be, whatever the fate of the antitrust legislation of this Congress may be, the people asked bread from the party to which the Senator belongs and they received a stone; the people were promised relief by that party only to be betrayed. Therefore, while changes may come, political unheavals occur, the day is far distant when the Senator from Utah will be able to congratulate himself that the party which turned its back upon its promises and upon its constituency will again be entrusted with the affairs of the National Government.

But this, Mr. President, is a deviation from what I intended to say when I took the floor. I want to express my dissent from any legislation which has for its object the creation of a commission to exercise any prerogative whatever unless its creation is absolutely essential to the public good.

Mr. STONE rose.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator from Missouri desire to interrupt me?

Mr. STONE. It is not important that I should do so. I simply desired to remark, however, that I was listening with a great deal of interest to the Senator's very timely speech, and inasmuch as it was directed, and very wisely directed, to Members on the other side of the Chamber, to express regret that they do not stay here to receive the benefit of the advice and admonitions so happily delivered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, Mr. President, it is too much to expect Senators to remain in the Chamber when what we call debate is proceeding. We are more apt on both sides of the Chamber to seek the seclusion, if not the protection, of the cloakrooms, responding on both sides only when a roll call is demanded. I am sorry to observe that my brethren on the other side are not present; but, inasmuch as I have frequently absented myself at times when the most eloquent of periods were flowing from the lips of some Republican Senator, I certainly want to be consistent so far as to say that their absence at the present time is in harmony with my own example.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. CLAPP. I will ask the Senator if his remarks apply also as an excuse and palliation for the absence of the overwhelming majority of our Democratic brethren just at this moment?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think I made the statement that honors were easy—I did not use that expression, but I intended to convey the idea that honors were easy—in the matter of attendance. I have noticed that on many occasions when the absence of a quorum has been suggested by a Senator on the other side, there were no more Senators present upon that side of the Chamber than were visible to the eye upon this side. That, of course, I understand to be designed to subserve a political purpose. I may say just now, however, that there are many times more Senators seated upon this side of the Chamber than upon the other.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, personally I never have taken any particular interest in the repeated suggestions of the absence upon this side or the other side of a quorum, but sitting here in a sort of quasi judicial capacity I have about reached the conclusion that honors are easy.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, Mr. President, it is apparent that upon one matter, at least, the Senator from Minnesota and myself are in absolute harmony.

I stated, Mr. President, before this diversion occurred that, as a general proposition, we should not, if it can be avoided, establish any more commissions than we have at the present time. I go a step further, and say that we ought to abolish every commission which we have which we can, without doing injury to the public service, dispense with. We are becoming prone to pass legislation and then provide for a commission to make that legislation effective. It has become the custom, rather than the exception, to create a board to carry out the terms and provisions of whatever statute of a general character we may enact, and as a consequence we are rapidly becoming a Government by commission; and each commission, with its numerous subordinate officials and servants, spreads over the country like the lice of Egypt. We come in contact with them everywhere; and apart from the complication and delay which the public business necessarily encounters when it is filtered through so many channels, and apart from the item of expense which commissions necessarily incur, is the greater objection that commission government is not democratic.

I do not know how many commissions we have at present, Mr. President. We call some of them boards and some of them bureaus, but a family resemblance runs through them all. The West, perhaps, experiences more vividly than any other section of the country the presence of bureaucratic government. Some time ago the Government of the United States, appalled by the abuses of the land laws, determined to withdraw practically all of the remaining public domain from the use of mankind and lock it up by a series of statutes and regulations for the use of unborn generations. In order to do this it became necessary, of course, to create boards and bureaus, and we have them ad nauseam—reclamation bureaus, forestry bureaus, experimental bureaus, and I presume we will soon have a power bureau. We have a Geological Survey and a field division. I said the other day that a man can not walk down the streets of any city west of the Missouri River without encountering the representative of a bureau in every other man that he meets; and if he has any business to transact in which the Government is concerned, that business must begin with some understrapper, who sometimes assumes that the entire weight and responsibility of the Government is upon his shoulders, and then, through him, by successive stages until you reach the ultimate source of authority.

These bureaus and commissions, Mr. President, have become intertwined and complicated with each other. They form a network which unites the War Department and the Interior Department and the Agricultural Department and the State Dement each with the other, so that in their distracting phases the public business is not only complicated, but it is hindered and expensive. Therefore I am constitutionally, as a member of the Democratic Party and by force of habit as a citizen of the great West, opposed to anything that looks like a new commission, if it can be avoided without injury to the public welfare.

Mr. President, when this objection of mine is urged in private my attention is called to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I am asked whether that is not the best possible illustration, not only of the necessity but of the beneficence of a public commission. I want to say, with perfect candor, that the Interstate Commerce Commission is the best of all of them, and it is probably a necessary commission. It is, however, sui generis; it has charge and control of a great branch of the public service; its jurisdiction extends over quasi public corporations, exercising quasi governmental functions, controlling the means of communication between ninety-odd millions of people through agencies that never should have been delegated to private hands, and which, because they were so delegated, have required the Government to reassert, to some extent, its power and authority over them. It therefore created the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is a commission of tremendous power and has been an agency of tremendous good; but that it has accomplished all that was expected of it, and that because it is necessary we should, therefore, imitate the example of the Congress which created it by creating others for kindred purposes, I deny in toto.

The evils growing out of private control of the agencies of transportation are, many of them, still apparent, and many of them have sprung into existence and developed and expanded since the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission and since the amplitude of its present powers was conferred upon it. One of the troubles with it—perhaps the most serious one—is that the business which demands its consideration is so vast in extent and so important in character that it is years behindhand in its work, and must continue to get further and further in arrears as its business increases with the growth of population. Take for illustration one instance——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WEST in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, except to interpolate this thought: Notwithstanding the overwhelming mass of duties imposed upon the existing Interstate Commerce Commission, there is a bill now pending to confer jurisdiction upon them to regulate the issuance of all kinds of securities by all the railroads in the country. I do not say that by way of criticism either of the commission or of the bill—I think it is necessary that some governmental authority should have some supervision over such matters—but simply to punctuate the Senator's remarks at this point, and to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that while I voted to report that bill, from the testimony before the committee I am quite certain that it will be perfectly impossible for the Interstate Commerce Commission to attend to the business, and to suggest that when the matter comes up the Senate should seriously consider the creation of a bureau within the Interstate Commerce Commission or some other great tribunal, which would have plenty to do if it devoted itself exclusively to the question of the issuance of railroad securities.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, of course I am aware of the pendency of that bill, and I think I appreciate the extent of the added duties and responsibilities that it proposes to place upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think, however, it deals with an evil which Congress must meet and legislate about in some manner. The method of operation, of course, is a very serious one.

I was about to illustrate when interrupted the statement which I made by calling attention to the fact that something like a year and a half ago, if I remember correctly, the eastern trunk lines made application to the Interstate Commerce Commission for leave to increase their freight charges 5 per cent over the rates then existing. Their contention was not only that this increase was necessary, but imminently so; that they were obliged to have it and have it at once, not only for their own, but for the protection and benefit of the public through needed improvements upon their lines of transportation, which could not be made without the fund to be realized from such increase. If that were true, Mr. President, it was an exigent matter, and yet the commission, burdened with the pendency of many other duties and requirements, has been unable up to this time to reach and announce its conclusion upon that important proposition. During the time which elapsed between the presentation of the petition and the time of its final determination everything which made it exigent must have occurred; every demand, in other words, for summary action there presented, every danger feared, and every contingency expected would have occurred before it would have been possible for the Interstate Commerce Commission to give the application due consideration and to pronounce its conclusions. So that commission, which is the exemplar of the entire scheme of commission government—that commission whose usefulness and whose necessity are so apparent—has by no means proven the effective agency for the control and regulation of transportation that was hoped for it, and yet it has done its best. I think the great benefit we have derived from the work and the institution of the Interstate Commerce Commission has been its demonstration that the regulation of transportation in this country is impossible so long as it is in private hands; that so long as the owner of the thing which is to be controlled and regulated is in practically full charge of it so long can that owner, by his policy and by his direction, if not defeat, largely undermine and make ineffective the rules and regulations of the governing power designed for the public benefit.

I do not believe it is possible, by a commission or by anything else, to regulate the transportation interest of this country. It must be controlled. It may be that control means ownership. So be it. It may be that it is a dire alternative. So be it. The experience of the Interstate Commerce Commission, however, if I am any judge of the situation, is that regulation without control or ownership is a disappointment and to some extent a failure.

Of course I am not in favor of abolishing the Interstate Commerce Commission, but I am not disposed to accept its action and its usefulness as an argument in favor of the creation of other and different commissions having charge of matters of private concern.

What is the scope of the proposed trade commission? It is to be called a Federal trade commission. It is to consist of five men. It is a sort of duplication of the Interstate Commerce Commission, differing from it not as to power, for perhaps it has more power than the Interstate Commerce Commission, but in the class of business over which it is to exercise control. The commission is to prevent unfair methods of competition through machinery provided by the bill itself. It has control, too, of all corporations engaged in interstate commerce throughout the country.

A corporation may do a small business within two States and over the common boundary line; it comes within the purview of the commission. A corporation may be of such illimitable proportions that it does a world-wide business, with American interstate commerce as a mere incident to it; it comes under the control of the commission. Every corporation between these two extremes doing any sort of interstate-commerce business comes within the control of the commission.

Mr. President, apart from what unfair competition is or may be lies the fact that every man who suffers from competition regards it as unfair. If my friend the Senator from Massachusetts is conducting a business that comes in competition with mine, and his business prospers while mine languishes, and our customers are within the same radius, I would be more than human, whatever his abilities or his superior knowledge of the business and its requirements might be, if I did not feel that his competition was "unfair and oppressive," as the Senator from New Hampshire would have it. Feeling so, and desiring relief from this unfair competition, my appeal will go to this commission, which must give me a hearing and determine accordingly. What is true of the case supposed will be true of all classes of interstate commerce wherever there is such a thing as competition. Consequently the amount of business, the number of controversies, the multitude of complaints that will be filed before this commission and which it must hear will soon mount into the millions, with five men to look after them. They can not possibly transact it. They must do it by proxy, and, of course, the number of proxies must be commensurate with the amount of business that falls within the purview of the commission.

Talk about the number of civil-service employees at present! Why, Mr. President, I believe, without exaggeration, that this commission can not begin to do the work that will be accumulated upon its records within the short space of 12 months after this bill becomes a law without the employment of thousands upon thousands of assistants; and each assistant, to be effective, must virtually have and exercise conclusive control, because the five commissioners can not operate both as commissioners of original and commissioners of appellate jurisdiction, or jurisdiction of review. I say they can not; I mean they can not do it physically. There are limitations upon the capacity and ability of all men, whether they be members of commissions or whether they be private individuals. The commission, in other words, is bound to break down under the load that will be placed upon it, because of the requirement that it shall prevent unfair methods of competition, before it will have been in office long enough to get a fair understanding of the law; and the amount of business must increase. Every order the commission makes will have a definite case in view, and will become a rule of action, and because it becomes a rule of action those who are affected by it will seek to evade it by those refinements and technicalities which men exercise everywhere in their efforts to overcome or evade the handicaps of the law.

It may be said that the fact that the amount of business the commission will have to transact is measureless is no argument against its necessity. That I concede; but if we can get along without it, if there is a better method of procedure, the fact that a commission if constituted will soon be overwhelmed and therefore will become incapacitated should be given great weight before the measure is enacted into law.

Just here let me again say that the bill we are considering is not the bill which came from the House. The statement has been made that the President approves the commission. He never approved this proposed commission. The House bill never assumed to place upon a commission any such burden as will fall upon it if we enact this law. The Interstate Commerce Committee, for the best of reasons, doubtless, and certainly because they felt that it was necessary to do so, have deliberately eliminated every word, every syllable, and every punctuation point of the House bill and substituted for it a bill of their own bearing very little resemblance to the original measure, and far more comprehensive and tremendous in its sweep and jurisdiction than the House bill ever contemplated. So that this is not the subject—or, if it is the subject, it has been so changed that its parents would not recognize it—which the House committee considered and which may have been submitted to the scrutiny and to the judgment of the President.

It may be that this plan is superior to that proposed by the House. I am not prepared to say whether it is or is not; but in view of the greater extension of responsibility and of power and of jurisdiction which the Senate bill proposes to place upon the shoulders of the commission, I should be inclined, if we must have one, to accept the proposition which came here from the House. And no one can charge that it was not well considered by the House committee.

Mr. President, is it democratic—and I use the term not in a partisan sense, but in its broader and more comprehensive meaning—to create a commission such as is here proposed and clothe it with the vast and inquisitorial powers with which we invest it by this bill? I think we should hesitate very long before making the final plunge. It will have a power and authority compared with which the power and the authority of the Congress of the United States is insignificant. It will have a power compared with which the judicial power of the United States becomes largely insignificant. It is true that there is a provision for court review, which makes me hesitate to emphasize the difference as strongly as I otherwise would; but when you consider that there is not a phase of interstate business, that there is not a corporation of any character engaged in it whose affairs are not subject to review and inspection and inquisition by this commission, and when you further consider what the vast sweep and extent of that business is, affecting 100,000,000 people, in every capacity of life, I deny that we should clothe five men with any such authority. I do not care how experienced or how wise they may be, how unimpeachable their integrity and their purposes, it is not democratic to do it, it is not safe to do it, it is not statesmanlike to do it, unless it is the dernier resort of a people suffering from a burden and who can not find relief in any other direction. In such a case, of course, we should not hesitate.

Then there is the question of expense. I have referred to the vast army of employees that will be necessary to constitute the machinery of this commission. The expenditures of this Government at present are enormous. We waste more money than any other nation in the world. There is not a private enterprise in the country whose business would survive 12 months if it were carried on as we administer the fiscal affairs of the Nation. We are profligate in many respects.

The other day we declined to give the Secretary of Commerce $75,000 which was absolutely necessary for the purpose of charting the uncharted waters of Alaska, for the preservation of life and property; but we had no difficulty in giving $75,000 for the celebration of the one-hundr*edth anniversary* of the Star Spangled Banner over here in Maryland or $250,000 for the erection of a monument to commemorate the Battle of Lake Champlain. It is true we do not pay much attention to the purposes of our expenditures; but when we consider that the machinery of this commission will require for its proper operation millions to be added to the volume of our expenditures as they now exist—and they are constantly increasing in other directions—I again ask whether it is necessary to commit the Democratic Party to a measure of this sort; for, Senators, it is we who must take the responsibility for this legislation. The friends of the bill upon the other side manfully and conscientiously support it; but for whatever mistake is made by the Sixty-third Congress the Democratic Party must answer, and the Democratic administration will be held responsible.

I do not believe that anybody except those who are in charge of the great combinations of the country has ever demanded this legislation. The speech to that effect which was made the other day by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and which is not yet completed, seems to me to be unanswerable. You must remember, too, that the action of this commission is as dependent upon the changing views of its members as has been the erratic action, or what in the view of the Senator from Nevada has been the erratic action, of the Department of Justice with reference to the enforcement of the antitrust laws.

Mr. President, I have another criticism to make of the proposed commission. It is that whatever its purposes may be—and I do not question the earnestness of the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Iowa when they contend that it will have a contrary effect—my judgment is that the effect of the commission when established will be not to prohibit but to regulate monopolies.

It is true that the spirit in which the law is conceived and the purpose of the men who conceived it are to the contrary. It is true also that their judgment as to the effect of it is perhaps entitled to much more respect than my own, for they have given many years to the consideration of this question and are, therefore, justified when they speak by authority.

While I may be obtuse, however, I can not conceive the fine distinction between the evils of unfair competition and the evils growing out of restraint of trade and the creation of monopolies that seems to be so clear to some of my brethren in this Chamber. To my mind unfair competition, while it is not always the companion of monopoly, is nevertheless an element that always enters into restraints of trade and the creation and practices of monopoly. It precedes, it accompanies, and it follows every monopoly in existence. The very essence of monopoly is its power to compete unfairly, its power to prohibit competition by stifling and destroying it, its power to resort with impunity to unfair methods.

I complain of some corporation as being engaged in unfair competition, and I go before the commission. The corporation against which I complain is summoned to appear before it, and it states its case. A ruling is made. If my petition is dismissed, the order is, in effect, a license. It is an order—a lawful order, in fact—qualifying the concern of which I have complained to continue in the practices I have challenged. If my petition is sustained, the order prohibits the corporation from continuing those practices. What is that but regulation, and what is regulation but the acknowledgment of the existence of something that requires regulation?

If the Government issues a license to a corporation to do business, it is a grant to the extent to which the license goes. If a Government agency gives permission to do a certain thing within its authority, it is a license. All of this means regulation; and as a result these huge combinations against which we are pledged to wage an eternal and everlasting warfare until they shall cease to exist—a warfare along legal lines, of course—will be given a national standing and character, and will justify and fortify their theories and practices upon the orders of a commission created by a Democratic Congress for that purpose.

Mr. President, if I understand the English language the Democratic platform is positively against that sort of legislation, and it is the only platform that is against it; while the other two, one of them very emphatically and the other very candidly, have indorsed the scheme of legislation which we are here considering. Let us see.

The Democratic Party at Baltimore said:

> A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable.

If it is, then it ought not to be permitted to exist. That conclusion, it seems to me, is inevitable if you admit the premise.

> We therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal as well as the civil law against trusts and trust officials, and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States.

Yet we are not only not going to enact legislation making it impossible for such a thing to exist, but we are about to enact legislation that is going to make it impossible for private monopolies to disappear—to make it impossible for us to eradicate them from the commercial and political body.

It is true that there are other bills pending here which have for their purpose the removal of these evils; but it seems to me that very fact is one of the strongest possible arguments that can be urged against this measure, since if we enact both on the one hand we offer to the people what we promise them, and on the other we indirectly say to the existing combinations, "You can do business, provided you will obey the mandates of the commission which we have just created."

We favor the declaration by law of the conditions upon which corporations shall be permitted to engage in interstate trade, including, among others, the prevention of holding companies, of interlocking directors, of stock watering, of discrimination in price, and the control by any one corporation of so large a proportion of any industry as to make it a menace to competitive conditions.

Precisely that sort of legislation is embodied in a measure introduced in this Congress by the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], being Senate bill 1138. It is a bill carefully prepared and carefully considered and corresponding in its every line and sentence with this declaration of the Democratic platform, fixing the conditions upon which these concerns may be permitted to engage in interstate commerce and enacting prohibitions by means of which those conditions may be made effectual.

I desire now to call attention to a part of the Progressive platform. It seems to me that if the Interstate Commerce Committee had had that platform before it as its guiding rule of action it could not have more completely conformed to it than it has done in the measure which is now the unfinished business of the Senate. After preliminaries, referring, among other things, to the abuse of monopoly, natural resources, and so forth, the Progressive Party said:

We do not fear commercial power, but we insist that it shall be exercised openly, under publicity, supervision, and regulation of the most efficient sort which will preserve its good while eradicating and preventing its evils.

That is what we are going to do here. Good competition is going to be decided and determined upon by this commission, and bad competition is going to be disposed of also by legal processes, which is regulation.

To that end we urge the establishment of a strong Federal administrative commission of high standing which shall maintain permanent active supervision over industrial corporations engaged in interstate commerce, or such of them as are of public importance, doing for them what the Government now does for the national banks and what is now done for the railroads by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The Senator having charge of this bill declares that that is just what will be done here; that business is going to be placed in the hands of a commission paralleling the Interstate Commerce Commission and paralleling that which was created for the management of banks, and therefore being in entire harmony with the requirements of the Progressive platform. But that platform continues:

Such a commission must enforce the complete publicity of those corporate transactions which are of public interest—

That is provided for here through examinations and requirements of annual reports, and so forth—must attack unfair competition—

That is proposed to be done here by section 5—

false capitalization and special privilege, and by continuous trained watchfulness guard and keep open equally to all the highways of American commerce. Thus the business man will have certain knowledge of the law and will be able to conduct his business easily in conformity therewith—

And so forth. I can understand, Mr. President, how the members of the Progressive Party, how Senators who supported Mr. Roosevelt in the campaign of 1912, can be content with and can support a bill of the sort I am now discussing, but for the life of me I can not understand how Democracy can do it in view of the fact that everywhere they emphasized their dissent during the campaign from this proposed regulation of monopoly, and in emphasizing it declared their purpose, inasmuch as it was indefensible and intolerable, to so legislate as to eradicate it entirely.

Now, I turn to the Republican platform, which, upon this subject, says:

In the enforcement and administration of Federal laws governing interstate commerce and enterprises impressed with a public use engaged therein there is much that may be committed to a Federal trade commission—

The Senator from Nevada has perhaps gone to the Republican platform in order to get a name for his commission—

thus placing in the hands of an administrative board many of the functions now necessarily exercised by the courts. This will promote promptness——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment:

This will promote promptness in the administration of the laws, avoid delays and technicalities incident to court procedure.

So we have gone to the Republican platform for the name for our commission and to the Progressive platform for the substance of it.

Now I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. I think I can testify in behalf of the Senator from Nevada and defend him from the charge of taking this name from the Republican platform. I have known the Senator now for about 12 years, and about the first thing I knew of him he was talking in behalf of a trade commission, calling it a trade commission, and he has been persistently and insistently talking trade commission ever since. Certainly he can be freed from the charge of having borrowed the name.

Mr. THOMAS. The charge I made was a very good-natured one. The Senator from Nevada knows that I would not if I could and could not if I would say anything that would intentionally reflect upon his integrity or his ability.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will say that I accept in good nature the remarks of the Senator; I am very much interested in them; but I simply wish to call attention to the fact, though possibly it may involve something of egotism to assert it, that it is quite possible the Republican Party took that name of trade commission from the bill which I had previously introduced for this purpose.

Mr. THOMAS. That is possible. It is also possible that the Progressive Party may have taken its platform from some speech of the Senator from Nevada. I do not know.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me suggest another thing. The Progressive Party made a very remarkable declaration in its Chicago platform, in some matters extreme and perhaps almost socialistic in character, but in many other matters pointing out a line of reform that might be well undertaken by any other party. The Senator will bear in mind that the Democratic Party at the last election was a minority party, and in order to be a majority party it has got to win from the opposing organizations. It seems to me that it can accept any suggestion that is right from the Progressive Party, which is pursuing substantially the same lines of reform that the Democratic Party has been pursuing, and that it might well adopt a suggestion that would be to the public interest.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I would be the last man to even question the commendation of the Senator from Nevada of the Progressive platform. I fully agree with him in all that he has said concerning the merits of that declaration. I believe in many respects it is one of the most valuable and one of the greatest of our modern political documents. In many respects it is fundamental Democracy, and I am in absolute harmony with it as far as it is Democratic.

I will go further than that; I will say that the great Republican Senators who on the floor of the Senate in 1909, 1910, and 1911 fought the battles of the people in opposition to the requirements of their own party began a great political revolution in the United States that will not end until the fundamental things for which they stood are crystallized into the legislation and policies of the country, and that the people are under a debt, and a lasting debt, of gratitude and obligation to those great men which I hope they will never forget. But there are some fundamental points of difference between us, one of which I have just discussed. That party has committed itself to the regulation of monopoly. We have committed ourselves to the proposition that it is indefensible and intolerable. While we are a minority party, Mr. President, and need all the votes that we can get and all the support we can secure, we certainly do not want them—could not get them if we did—by a surrender of fundamental Democratic doctrines, to which we are largely indebted for the fact that we are in power to-day.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I would not in any way surrender one iota of Democratic principle. The Democratic Party is undoubtedly committed to the destruction of monopoly. My interpretation of the pending bill is, however, that the pending legislation tends toward the destruction of monopoly and not its maintenance.

Mr. THOMAS. I am quite aware of that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The interstate trade commission is organized with a view to laying bare the methods and the organization and the practices that constitute monopoly. It is organized for the purpose of aiding the courts in destroying monopoly. It is organized for the purpose of aiding the Attorney General in the prosecution of his duties in the destruction of monopoly. All that it does in the accomplishment of the destruction not only of monopoly but of monopolistic practices which ultimately end in monopoly and which are the embryo of monopoly is to add to the condemnation of the practices which constitute unfair competition. The destruction of unfair competition does not give an immunity bath to monopoly anywhere. On the contrary, the destruction of unfair competition prevents these organizations from growing in strength and power and in the development of their monopolistic practices and control.

I claim that both the acts which are now pending are in harmony with the Democratic platform. It simply, with reference to a trade commission, puts into the law a conception which has been urged by Democrats for years, which happens to have been accepted by the Progressive Party and as a part of its pronunciamento of two years ago.

I am glad to say that I agree with the Senator from Colorado in his estimate of the rank and file of the Progressive Party and of many of the great leaders of that party. I should like to see them all become members of the Democratic Party. The Progressive Party now is in process of disintegration, and the question is whether the members of that party will return to the Republican Party and thus tend to maintain the policy of reaction or whether they will join themselves with the Democratic Party as the party of reform and of progress.

I would gladly facilitate the latter process; and let me say that wherever we can harmonize our principles with the methods which they have approved in such a way as to draw into our organization men who have been prominent in this reform we are serving the cause of the Democratic Party and Democracy throughout the entire country.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have never doubted the sincerity of purpose or earnestness of my friend the Senator from Nevada. I know he intends to reach, if he can, the same end to which I am committed. Our difference lies in the process. His insistence is that this measure will carry out the general purpose and make it effective. My insistence is that it will result in perpetuating the evil of which we complain. He may be right and I may be wrong, but until I can see some light to the contrary I am unable to concur in the effect or in the character of the pending measures as he defines them.

Mr. President, I made the statement that this bill not only is in complete harmony with the Progressive platform and in a fair measure of harmony with the Republican platform, but that it was also in line with what the representatives of the great monopolies of the United States desire. We all recall the fact that shortly after the trend of decisions was in favor of the maintenance of the integrity of the antitrust law men like Judge Elbert H. Gary, George W. Perkins, and other great trust magnates began publicly to advocate it, and that part of the press devoted to the interest of these great concerns began also to advocate the regulation of interstate commerce, either by commission or by the enactment of a national incorporation law or both. There was an entire change of front on the part of the monopolistic interests of the United States; in other words, toward a trade commission and toward the regulation of these matters, just as soon as it appeared from the decisions of the courts that the Sherman law meant precisely what it said and that it would be enforced accordingly.

One of the instances attending the birth of the Progressive Party was the celebrated conference in the city of New York between Mr. George W. Perkins and Theodore Roosevelt, who shortly afterwards announced that "his hat was in the ring." If my information is correct, it was Mr. Perkins who drew this particular plank of the Progressive platform, and I have no doubt that his support and the support of others in sympathy with him went to the Progressive Party morally, physically, and financially because of the fact that Mr. Roosevelt stood for the regulation of monopoly.

Consequently this measure has for its support the general tendency of the combinations of the country, the Progressive Party, and the Republican Party. Does anybody believe that the Republican Party would have committed itself to a trade commission upon the theory that its establishment would lead to the extinction and destruction of monopoly? The whole history of the party is in the other direction. Does anyone believe that the Progressive Party expected anything more than the regulation of monopolies, its contention being that they were the inevitable development and evolution of manufactures and commerce and of trade, keeping pace with the demands and the progress of civilization?

No, Mr. President; ours is the only great national organization which committed itself squarely against monopoly, which declared it indefensible, which declared it intolerable, and which pledged itself to the people that it would legislate for its prevention. That is precisely what I hoped it would do, and which I fear it will not do in the enactment of the pending measure.

Now, Mr. President, the evil to be eliminated——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Before the Senator proceeds to a new point I wish to call his attention to the fact that, while it is true that Mr. Gary of the Steel Trust and other chiefs of the great industrial concerns of the country immediately after the Standard Oil and the Tobacco Trust decisions declared in favor of some kind of an industrial commission which would regulate industries just as the Interstate Commerce Commission regulates railroads, the kind of a commission which they wanted was not the kind of a commission which this bill provides for.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, I concede that. It does not go as far as they would have gone if they were in power. But the difference is in degree and not in kind.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The commission which they wanted was a commission which would recognize consolidation, which would recognize monopoly, but would regulate it even to the extent of regulating its prices. They saw before them destruction as the result of the decisions of the Supreme Court in those cases, far-reaching as they were, embracing every form of consolidation, of monopoly, and of device pending toward monopoly, and they saw that their organizations would be broken up if those decisions were made effective. Hence, with a view to saving their organizations and preserving the consolidations which they had effected, they said, "We surrender; let our form of organization stand; treat us as public utilities and fix our prices."

If the Senator will just permit me to go a step further, that is what they wanted, and they gathered hope only after the decrees were made when they found that practically the decisions of the court had become inoperative through faulty decrees and through a faulty enforcement of those decrees. The Senator has heard but little clamor since then, if any, in favor of a commission which would regulate prices, for they hoped to maintain practically their monopoly through the administrative inefficiency of the courts to carry into practical operation the dissolution which the courts had decreed. They relied upon faulty administration for protection, and since then they have not been so clamorous for the regulation of monopoly.

Now, this kind of a commission is an entirely different commission. This commission is not to recognize consolidation, but to destroy it. It is not to recognize monopoly, but to destroy it. It is creating a new commission which will aid the courts.

We will have a commission which will aid the courts where they are at present faulty in the administrative processes that are necessary to destroy these consolidations and to destroy these monopolies, and to aid both the courts and the Attorney General in the administration of the law. Instead of regulating monopoly we are regulating unfair competition. We are not taking these monopolies under the tutelage and the guardianship of this commission. On the contrary, this commission is organized to destroy them. It is so organized as not only to aid the courts and the Attorney General, but it will impair and destroy monopoly in the future in the embryo, for the monopolies of the future are not to be created by enormous consolidations. Those days have gone by. It would be utterly impossible to-day to create a consolidation of corporations such as was effected in the case of the Steel Trust; but it is possible through unfair methods of competition, with an entirely legal organization, to resort to these devices which the law has in repeated decisions condemned and by which it would be possible to build up the monopolies of the future just as effectively, though differing in character, as those at present organized.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the evil to be eliminated, as I stated before, is one about which we do not differ, but perhaps its definition will somewhat clear the atmosphere. For that purpose I want to read into the RECORD a statement of Mr. Robert R. Reed, of the New York bar, made before the Committee on the Judiciary of the House during the hearings upon the trust legislation then before it, and involving, I think, this identical bill. He said:

> That view is that the American trust grows out of the corporation and out of the corporation alone; that it grows out of the extension of the corporation to commercial and industrial business without requiring adequate safeguards against monopoly, without primarily so safeguarding an industrial or trade corporation that it must always remain an independent business unit. I believe that if that were done—and it could be done and has been done in times past—there would be no trusts in the United States.
> There are practically no trusts in England, which creates its own corporations and looks after them, in the first instance. We all know what the corporation situation has been in this country. By reason somewhat of our dual system of government, though unnecessarily so, we have had 48 States more or less competing, and several of those States competing actively, in the sale of corporate charters, corporate rights, and special privileges, not for the benefit for their own citizens at all, but competing in the sale of corporate privileges to be used by citizens of other States, giving them powers which their own States would not give them and, incidentally, enabling them to harness the commerce of the United States. We have seemed to be helpless before that situation, and, as a matter of fact, I think we have been ignorant of it until the last few years.

* * * * * * *

Let us suppose, for an instant, that corporations formed by Brazil or France come into the United States with unsafe powers, blanket charters. Whose duty would it be to protect the commerce of the Nation against such corporations? Would it be the duty of the individual States or the duty of Congress?

Of course he makes the correct statement that it would be the duty of Congress. But that precise duty of Congress, Mr. President, applies also to corporations created in one State and doing an interstate business, and particularly to those corporations which are created in one State nominally but which do all their business, virtually, in other States.

If it be true, then, that the evil grows out of the formation of corporations by States and by foreign nations, and that these corporations are armed with extraordinary powers on the one hand and freed from the safeguards that ought to apply to all corporate action upon the other, then the remedy is a simple one. It is to so legislate as to prevent such corporations from carrying on interstate commerce and business. When that is done the requirement of the Democratic platform is absolutely complied with. No commissions are necessary, the enormous expense of national administration of the subject is eliminated, and the courts will be amply capable through their ordinary equipment to meet and overcome any conditions that would threaten the continuation of monopolies.

Mr. President, such a thing as monopoly at common law is inconceivable; it is impossible. At the common law all practices leading to an engrossment of the market, to the cornering of commodities, or to the establishment of monopolistic conditions were reachable and punishable by the common-law courts.

Monopolies, then, have their foundation and their origin in law and in express law. They are the outgrowth of royal grants, of licenses, or of statutes, and in this country they are the outgrowth of State legislation. They are the natural offspring of that competitive condition which at one time existed and which still exists between States, which, for the purposes of revenue, began to remove the safeguards and restrictions thrown around corporations necessary to the protection of the people in their action, until finally every safeguard disappeared from the laws of some of the States, which became at once a snug harbor for every corporate adventurer on the face of the earth who could obtain his charter and sail out of it to prey upon the commerce and the property and the citizens of the other States of the Union.

The fact that more than one State was engaged in granting these enormous privileges only served to increase the number and powers of the combinations, whose offenses make this legislation necessary.

In 1911 Judge Edgar H. Farrar, of New Orleans, at that time president of the American Bar Association, delivered an address to that body upon this identical subject, one of the most notable addresses ever directed to it. He discussed the genesis and growth of monopoly in America, which properly led up to the corporation and the corporation only.

Former Attorney General Wickersham laid down the same proposition as long ago as February, 1910, at which time he said that our modern monopolies grew from public grants, just as surely as monopoly in England came from royal grants, and he instanced the holding companies. A corporation, Mr. President, as originally designed was a very simple matter. It was the object of a special act of the legislature. Its powers were defined and strictly defined, and they were generally confined to one object. The amount of its capital stock was fixed and the price at which it was to be sold.

Within the orbit created by the statute it could conduct business, and beyond that orbit it could not transgress with impunity. It was, as I have stated, a most useful and essential agency for the development of commerce and for the progress of civilization. It was never permitted in those days to become the holder of shares in some other concern; it was never permitted to issue a share of stock that did not represent actual value received by the corporation generally in the form of cash; it was never permitted to transgress upon the possessions or the territory of other corporations, but the vast possibilities involved in the transaction of corporate business upon the one hand, coupled with the exemption from personal liability of the incorporators and stockholders upon the other, together with a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to the effect that the charter was a contract which could not be violated, led to the enormous expansion of the corporations in the United States, until finally corporations were created under general law, so that instead of requiring a special act of the general assembly all that was necessary was to draw a charter in accordance with the requirements of the general statute available to everybody.

I have not the time, Mr. President, to trace the evolution of the corporation. Suffice it to say that its expansive power seemed to have no limitation until the time came during the latter part of the last century when in some of the States of the Union a corporation under general law could be created for the purpose of engaging at one and the same time in every pursuit and pastime of which the mind of man could conceive except one. That exception referred to the activities of the corporation in the States of their creation. I have drawn a number of these acts of incorporation myself, and I think I have some familiarity with the subject. You can take any corporation organized under the law of New Jersey, since the corporation law of that State that was in force until the administration of Gov. Wilson, and some parts of which are yet in force, and you will discover, Mr. President, that the powers of the New Jersey corporation are boundless. They include everything except the power to build a railroad in New Jersey; they can do business anywhere on the face of the earth and do any kind of business; they can carry on any pursuit whether it is business or not that they may see fit to carry on. Then there is an all-saving and all-embracing clause in the charter which provides, in substance, that they can do anything else not specifically mentioned which would have been mentioned if it had occurred to the incorporators at the time of their incorporation.

Mr. President, when creatures of that sort can find solid foundation upon an existing law and derive their strength and sustenance from the statutes of a sovereign State and are given access to every other State in the Union and to the other principalities of the world monopoly is just as sure to follow as that the night follows the day.

The fact that a corporation endowed with a roving commission could do what it pleased would result in monopoly was perceived at a very early period. In 1688 the people of Massachusetts protested against the charter of a trading corporation with power to open mines in New England, the objection to the charter being that it would tend to create a monopoly, and, therefore, to enhance prices. Unfortunately, the States being independent of each other, no State could by legislation interfere with and prevent the existence of monopoly within its borders so long as other States were free to organize and turn these creatures loose upon them.

Let me give an illustration of that fact. I think it was some time during the 90's—the last decade of the last century, in any event—that the Standard Oil Co. was declared to be a monopoly in the State of Ohio, and its dissolution was therefore ordered. It complied with the order and submitted to a dissolution, but it immediately went to New Jersey and there reincorporated in a more aggravated form and carried on its business just as it had done before in the State of Ohio, and of course spread its tentacles all over the United States.

Take another instance. The State of New York incorporated the New York Central Railroad and gave it powers of an undefined and sweeping and extensive character; the State of New Jersey created the United States Steel Corporation and authorized it, as I have said, under the terms of its charter to do anything anywhere throughout the wide universe, except that it could not build a railroad in New Jersey; the State of Pennsylvania created through the exercise of its sovereign power the Pennsylvania Railroad. Those three concerns, each the creature of a separate sovereignty, were able, nevertheless, under the forms of law and based upon law, to practically combine their various energies and enterprises, to increase their capital to suit their own sweet will, and by their cooperative action to extend their powers, industrial, economic, and political, without limitation from any source.

You can not find a monopoly, Mr. President, where the English language is spoken that is not a creature of law, based upon law, and existing by virtue of express authority conferred by law. That is so clear, and the remedy is so obvious, as it seems to me, that instead of considering three bills, one of which now before the Senate has for its purpose, whether intended or not, the regulation and perpetuation of these evils, we should enact a series of prohibitory provisions as applied to corporations engaged in interstate commerce, and go home.

If we declare that no corporation shall engage in interstate commerce which is possessed of more than certain enumerated powers; that no corporation shall engage in interstate commerce whose capital does not represent the actual amount of its assets; that no corporation shall engage in interstate commerce that is one of a series of subsidiary corporations engaged in the same supposed competitive business; that no corporation shall engage in interstate commerce which is a holding company of a number of subsidiaries engaged in the same business; that no corporation shall engage in interstate commerce that is affiliated with any transportation company; that no transportation company engaged in interstate commerce shall be permitted to have an interest in any corporation dealing in any subject matter of traffic of that concern; and some other inhibitions of similar character, accompanied by appropriate penalties to be enforced by the courts in the event the laws are evaded or avoided or violated, we end the whole question of monopoly in the United States, in my judgment. Within 24 months from the time such an act went into effect every one of the huge predatory concerns would be compelled to revise its charter under the State of its creation or go out of business.

This, Mr. President, is not only within the power of Congress, but it is its duty. If the people of my State, by legislation of a pernicious character, can create institutions that invade the State of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and indulge in monopolistic or other injurious practices there, the State of Mississippi is powerless to do more than protect itself, in which event the institutions I speak of can easily cross the river into Louisiana or they can march eastward into Alabama or northward into Tennessee, while some other institution will come from some other State and take the Mississippi field which has been abandoned.

One conception that I have of the necessity for a General Government is the protection of all the people of all the States from the wrongs inflicted upon them by the people or by the legislature of any State; and since monopoly is founded and grounded upon law, upon statute, upon license, or upon grant, why should we not, as thinking, sensible beings, go to the root of the evil and see to it that such laws shall not have any operative effect outside of and beyond the jurisdiction of the States creating them?

It may be, Mr. President, that this remedy is so simple that it may not address itself to the reasoning faculties of the average man, but its simplicity should commend it. When it is contrasted with a measure that goes to the other extreme, a measure which creates a commission, which requires that commission to delve into the business of every concern in the United States engaged in interstate commerce, a commission to which is committed the duty of preventing unfair methods of competition among a hundred million people, from whose decision resort can be had to the courts, therefore making the courts the ultimate arbiter in the last instance, a commission which will require thousands upon thousands of employees properly to discharge its functions, a commission that is bound to be swamped and overburdened and overwhelmed by the multitude of controversies which will immediately seek relief through its agency, a commission which is absolutely undemocratic and opposed to the positive mandate of the Democratic platform—faced with such an alternative, the simplicity of the actual remedy which is suggested by Senate bill 1138 ought to be its chief recommendation. It needs no board for its enforcement, Mr. President. Woe unto the corporation which fails to comply with its requirements. It will put an end to the creation of these concerns in one State that they may do business and exercise their powers in the others.

Mr. President, one of the most shameful episodes in American history, in my opinion, is the disgraceful competition that has been going on for a good many years in some of the States of the Union in the business of creating corporations by offering special inducements to those who desire to utilize the corporate form to escape all personal responsibility to incorporate their concerns under the laws of the particular State.

I think New Jersey is perhaps the greatest of all sinners in this regard, and then Delaware and Maine and West Virginia, and at one time South Dakota and the former Territory of Arizona, all offering special inducements through legislation to every man desiring or willing to transact a dishonest business, to every man who is ready to take chances, to every individual who has a scheme which may or may not be successful, and, if not successful, who desires to escape from consequent liability—these States have been competing for corporate business from such characters. I do not know of a single safeguard that is left in the laws of some of these States for the protection of the man or the woman who deals with their corporations if those who manage them are disposed to be unscrupulous, dishonest, or monopolistic. The invitation has been, "Come unto us, organize your corporation, and then go forth and carry on your business as you please in our sister States under the shield and protection of our laws, for you are exempt from all responsibility and clothed with unlimited authority."

Why, Mr. President, monopoly is as sure as the procession of the seasons to follow such a condition.

Mr. President, I have spoken longer than I intended upon this subject, yet I have said but little. The views which I have expressed are not original ones. I do not know that anyone can claim that distinction; but they have been elaborated with exhaustive ability within the past three or four years by a distinguished member of the New York bar, Mr. Robert R. Reed, who, I understand, prepared the structure of Senate bill 1138. I have merely attempted in a somewhat crude way to emphasize the principal points of Mr. Reed's contentions, for they address themselves to the unqualified approval of my judgment. His argument is irrefutable. We should adopt such preventive legislation upon this great subject as its importance demands and set our faces against all commissions and other administrative agencies.

Mr. President, legislation such as is here proposed is destructive of the principle of State rights, a principle which the Democratic Party has always maintained. The term may be a somewhat indefinite expression; it certainly is susceptible of various definitions, and may mean one thing at one time and another thing at another time; but the fundamental concept of our community life is local self-government. All parties profess to believe in it; but every time that a law of this kind is enacted and matters of a local significance and character are transferred to the control of a national commission, we invade the ancient principle of local self-government, weaken the force of State authority, and extend the boundaries of Federal power.

You can not govern a hundred million people, Mr. President, from a great central point like Washington. It never was intended that national authority should be utilized for any other than essential national and general purposes; but we are becoming more and more a Government concerning itself with matters of a local character, matters which are the proper subject of State, of county, of municipal regulation and control; and just as surely as this commission is created, with its agents and representatives scattered all over the face of the United States, exercising its powers and wielding its authority, making its orders and enforcing them in every city and every village and in every crossroads of the country, each of them subject to supervision at Washington, we wrest a great field of local self-government from the States and their local subdivisions and transfer them to the General Government, there to remain forever as a part and parcel of the central and national authority and subject to all the objections, as it will be to all the delays and complications, that such a condition necessarily entails.

I have often wondered, Mr. President, whether any of the founders and framers of the Constitution ever entertained the remotest conception of the tremendous possibilities involved in the commerce clause of that document. I have often wondered whether the mind of man could then have conceived the idea that from this clause of the Constitution would come expansive forces of government encompassing all the activities of commerce and of industry, such as we have witnessed during the past 25 or 30 years. If the States as sovereign entities shall disappear from the political map of the United States, it will be through the construction given to the commerce clause of the Constitution, coupled with the tremendous extension of the jurisdiction of the Federal courts through interpretations of the fourteenth amendment. Between the two the Government at Washington, through legislation of this sort, is becoming the source as well as the center of all of the economic and industrial activities of the Republic.

Mr. President, I can not bring my mind to support this measure. If it be true that we must have a commission, then it were far better to go back to the House bill and enact that into law. I think it would be far better, Mr. President, if we could substitute for all three of the so-called antitrust measures Senate bill 1138, since it comprises the alpha and omega of the so-called trust program. It is simple, effective, complete. It meets every requirement, provides against every contingency, removes every evil. It destroys every existing monopoly and prevents the creation of others. It conforms with our platform, harmonizes with democracy, and will command the applause of every thinking man and woman who cares to examine its provisions.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House disagrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate No. 158 to the bill (H. R. 17824) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and further insists upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 158.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WEST in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate No. 158 to the bill (H. R. 17824) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and further insisting upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 158.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate recede from its amendment No. 158.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. JONES. What is the amendment?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will say to the Senator that there was only one amendment in disagreement between the two Houses; and that was amendment No. 158, the object of which was to enable payments to be made of certain arrearages of pay due officers who left the Regular Army and became officers in the Confederate Army. This amendment, which was put on by the Senate, had no other purpose than to enable these officers to collect the balance standing to their credit on the books of the Treasury Department. The House has twice refused to concur in the amendment, and I think it is necessary to accept that determination on the part of the House. I therefore move that the Senate recede from its amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, with many of the provisions of the pending bill I am in entire accord. I believe in its inquisitorial features so far as they apply to the investigation of the practices of corporations, trade associations, and corporate combinations; I believe in conferring power upon the proposed interstate trade commission to act as a master in chancery where the courts in their wisdom may desire to refer cases to them after a decree has been entered for the purpose of working out methods of dissolution. I believe also that the commission should be clothed with power to see to it that corporations which have been thus dissolved comply with the decree of the court. With such powers the commission may be of great assistance to the Department of Justice in enforcing the antitrust laws.

I wish this afternoon briefly to address myself to section 5. I recognize that there is a principle in this section which is worthy of our most serious consideration, but I can not support the provision in the bill as it is now drawn, and I want to call the attention of the Senate to a few of its features which I think are seriously objectionable.

I have offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute for this section. Some of the objections which I urge to the original section of the bill as reported to the Senate by the committee will apply with equal force to the amendment which I have proposed, but there are many other objections to section 5 which I have sought to avoid by the amendment proposed.

One of the most unsatisfactory features of this bill is that which declares unfair competition to be unlawful, without any attempt to define what unfair competition is; and I have seen no bill thus far which eliminates that objection. I was led to believe, and I believe now, that if it were to become the law of the land the courts would hold that the words "unfair competition" mean only such practices as are held to be unfair competition under the common law. I can not believe that the term "unfair competition" could be used in its colloquial or popular sense, if it has a colloquial or popular sense, which I do not believe.

Before I take up that feature of the bill, however, I desire to call attention to some other objections a little more in detail.

First, there is nothing in this section which requires a complaint to be filed with the commission setting forth what the alleged unfair competition is. There is a provision to the effect that if the commission shall have reason to believe a corporation has been guilty of unfair competition, then it shall serve a notice upon the corporation requiring it to show cause why an order should not be entered prohibiting the alleged unfair competition; and note this, please: If after this hearing the commission shall be of the opinion that the corporation was not guilty of any unfair practice, there is not to be entered any order showing that the corporation has been a law-abiding citizen. There is no provision at all for any order or record.

We know as members of the bar and as business men that the public is interested not only in knowing what things are prohibited by the law or by the courts, but when a practice has been passed upon by a tribunal of any sort the public is interested in knowing that that practice is a valid, legal practice.

Again, under this section if the commission shall be of the opinion that the practices are in fact unfair competition, an order is issued, and then the unfortunate corporation is in this predicament: Even though it was of the opinion that the practice which it had adopted in its business was legal and entirely ethical, the corporation would be compelled to comply with the order of the commission or openly defy it. I submit that no corporation should be put in the position of openly defying an order of any tribunal; but if that corporation feels itself aggrieved, it should have the right to have some sort of a review of the findings of which it complains.

It is true that if the corporation shall openly defy the law, then the bill before us provides that the commission may make its application to a court of proper jurisdiction for an order to compel obedience to its order. It seems to me, however, that in this country of ours the corporation or person complained of should have the right to go to a tribunal on its own motion for relief and not be compelled to defy the order of a commission in order that its future rights might be determined.

Mr. President, having these objections in mind, I have submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute for section 5, which provides—to state briefly the substance of it—when the commission shall have reason to believe, either from information it may have gleaned or upon the complaint of some one, that a corporation has been guilty of unfair competition, then a complaint shall be filed in writing setting forth concisely the facts constituting the alleged unfair competition; that a notice shall be served upon the delinquent party; that a trial may be had; that the final judgment of the commission shall be entered, whether it be for or against the corporation; and then, if the corporation is not satisfied with the order of the commission, it shall have the right to go to the United States district court and file its petition setting forth the complaint and a certified copy of the proceedings before the commission, including the testimony and the order of the commission, and have the matter passed upon by that court the same as if a proceeding had been begun de novo by any complainant in the court.

Mr. KERN. Would the commission have the same right?

Mr. POMERENE. The commission will have the same right in the event that the order is not complied with. If it feels that in the proper administration of affairs it should be complied with, then the commission may file its petition, with a transcript of the proceedings before the commission, with like effect.

I further provide, after the analogy of the procedure adopted in the commerce act, that the mere filing of this proceeding shall not operate ipso facto as a suspension of the order of the commission, but that upon a hearing and upon a proper showing a suspension of the order in whole or in part may be ordered by the court for a period of 60 days, and that on a like showing it may be continued from time to time, if in the judgment of the court it seems proper.

I do not see how there can be any objection to that method of procedure, and I can never get away from the principle which I learned in the early days of my study of the law, that every man is entitled to his day in court.

I desire now to call attention to what I believe the phrase "unfair competition" means as contained both in the pending bill and in the amendment which I have proposed.

I recognize the fact that ordinarily if words are used in legislation which have a popular significance the courts will attach that meaning to them; but there is another principle equally well founded, and that is if words have a technical meaning the courts will give that technical meaning to them; and if words, phrases, or clauses have been given a particular meaning by the common law or by statute law, then, unless it clearly appears to have been the legislative intent to the contrary, the meaning will be given to those words in the statute which they had at the common law or in other statutes.

I want to call the attention of the Senate briefly to a few authorities upon this proposition.

Nims, in his work on Unfair Business Competition, in section 3, says that "the common law, not trade-mark statutes, is the basis of the law of unfair competition"; and as a general rule what we know on the subject of unfair competition comes to us from the common law, not from any statute. I recognize the fact that at times we speak of unfair competition as being connected only with the law of trade-marks. Not so; it is very much broader.

Now, let me refer for a few minutes to some of the canons on this subject of construction, as contained in Sutherland's work on Statutory Construction. I read from page 752:

Where a word having a technical as well as a popular meaning is used in the constitution or a statute the courts will accord to it its popular signification, unless the very nature of the subject indicates, or the context suggests, that it is used in its technical sense.

Again, on page 753:

Words in common use and also having a technical sense will, in acts intended for general operation, and not dealing specially with the subject to which such words in their technical sense apply, be understood primarily in their popular sense unless they are defined in the act or a contrary intention is otherwise manifest.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Pardon me until I shall have finished this. But note:

Such words, however, will be understood in a technical sense when the act treats of the subject in relation to which such words are technically employed.

I now yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. COLT. I am much interested in what the Senator read from the textbook of Nims. I will ask him, if he will not go on for a section or two further in the book, where he will find that the author does not confine the words "unfair competition" strictly to the trade-mark cases, but broadens out the term to the view laid down in the Mogul Steamship Co. case. It was there held that unfair competition exists where one man interferes with the business of another by fraud, misrepresentation, physical obstruction, intimidation, and so forth. I think the author quotes the language of the opinion in the Mogul case. It was also said in that opinion that it was impossible to define unfair competition at common law unless you confine it to that which is illegal or fraudulent; in other words, that it is not a question of morals or good manners, and that if you are going to use "unfair competition" in that sense, it is beyond the power of the court to define it.

I think the Senator will find that Nims in his book adopts the meaning of unfair competition as laid down substantially in the Mogul Steamship case, and that it will be found that this is the meaning of these words as known in the common law.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the Senator has correctly stated the law. It is a matter of constant growth, undoubtedly; but I submit that when it comes to the question of the growth of the common law we should depend rather upon our courts than upon a mere commission that may be appointed when we know not who may be placed upon that commission, or what may be their qualifications.

I wanted, however, to go a step further with reference to the rules of construction.

Again, on page 757, Sutherland says:

"Where a statute uses a word which is well known and has a definite sense at common law or in the written law without defining it, it will be presumed to be used in that sense, and will be so construed unless it clearly appears that it was not so intended. Words having a precise and well-settled meaning in the jurisprudence of a country are to be understood in the same sense when used in statutes unless a different meaning is unmistakably intended."

And the author cites in support of this proposition, among other cases, Perkins v. Smith (116 New York, p. 441).

Believing as I do, that the words "unfair competition" are used in this bill and in the amendment which I propose just as they are used in the common law, I think the constitutionality of this section can be defended; but if we are going to give it a wider meaning, a wider scope, so that its limitations shall be only in the minds of this commission, in my humble judgment we are conferring upon this commission not only administrative functions but legislative and judicial powers as well.

To illustrate, I take it that Senators will agree with me that there is a certain line governing questions of competition upon the one side of which, under the rules of the common law, everything would be regarded as unfair competition, and on the other side of that line every practice which would be engaged in would be regarded as fair competition.

Now, let us suppose, for the sake of the argument, that it is the purpose of the Government to declare that many of the things which are now embraced within the subject of fair competition upon the one side of that line shall be no longer regarded as fair competition, but shall come within the inhibition of the law. Can it be said that a mere administrative tribunal may exercise this power and declare a thing unlawful which heretofore has been lawful? In my humble judgment, that is a legislative power.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Returning to the observation made by the Senator from Ohio a few moments ago with regard to the construction that should be put upon a phrase or a word taken from the common law, when Congress in 1890 made unlawful a restraint of trade it took that phrase from the common law. I assume the Senator from Ohio will agree with me about that.

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Ohio believe that the words "restraint of trade" in that act mean at the present time in the United States what they meant in the common law in 1890?

Mr. POMERENE. I do, and the majority of the court so held. The words "in restraint of trade" the Senator, if I understand him correctly, would define as they are defined in the popular sense. They were, in fact, defined by the Supreme Court as those words were used in the common law.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have often heard the Senator from Ohio criticize the Supreme Court for the introduction of the word "undue," or "unreasonable," as found in its later decisions, into the Sherman law.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, with all due respect to the Senator's statement, I think he is not correct. I have on several occasions said that in my earlier study of this subject I preferred the opinion of the majority of the court in the Trans-Missouri case; but after having gone into this subject very carefully and very fully, as I believe, I think the majority of the Supreme Court have adopted the proper interpretation of that statute.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well. I did not know that the Senator had reached that conclusion, and I may be mistaken about having heard him suggest otherwise; but I desire to call his attention to the fact that up to the present time, in construing those words in England, the courts have never held an arrangement or a contract or a combination to be in restraint of trade unless it was affirmatively shown, and the court could find, that the restraint of trade was injurious to the public interest and had detrimentally affected the public welfare. Does the Senator believe that the antitrust law, the act of 1890, should be construed in that way at this time?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator is getting away from the bill that we have before us. The question which he suggests is purely an academic one at this time and during this discussion. I have no hesitancy in saying, however, that a restraint, in order to be within the prohibition of the Sherman law, must be an undue restraint. That is the general proposition; and the difficulty, of course, comes in the application of the law to a given state of facts—a difficulty which we have in every lawsuit that is ever tried.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the respect in which I thought my suggestion was material to the argument being made by the Senator from Ohio was when he stated that when we used a word or a phrase that has been known to common law we must forever thereafter attach to it the meaning, and only the meaning, that was understood at the time the act was passed.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator must not thus represent me. I recognize the fact that the common law is a growing, vital system, that it is constantly developing; but I want it to be developed in the courts, and if it is to be modified I want the Congress of the United States to exercise its function in that behalf.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no great quarrel with the Senator from Ohio in that respect; but we are in this situation: The Senator from Ohio feels that if we use the phrase "unfair competition" it must mean what it has been held to mean, or as it has been applied, in the common law.

Mr. POMERENE. As a general proposition, I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, the United States as such has no common law, and there is no way in which the United States can develop such a common law as was developed by the judges of Great Britain or of England. My contention is that there is a principle underlying every such phrase if used in the common law; that there is an evil to be reached, and that when we employ such a word or such a phrase we must keep in view all the while the principle upon which the definition or application was given to the word or phrase, and apply it from time to time in consonance with that principle. If that be true, the words "unfair competition" can grow and broaden and mold themselves to meet circumstances as they arise, just as the words "restraint of trade" have grown and have been molded in order to meet the necessities of the American people.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, technically, of course, lawyers say there is not any Federal common law. As a general proposition I concede that; but for more than 100 years in Federal courts as well as in the State courts cases involving unfair competition have been before those courts. In that way there has been builded up what is in fact a common law, whether we are going to admit it technically or not.

Mr. President, I recognize the fact that in the able discussion of this subject by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] many authorities have been cited in the effort to sustain the belief of the Senators citing those cases. I think the Senator from New Hampshire cited a number of cases from State courts which held that certain practices constituted unfair competition, and these were cited to sustain the view that the words "unfair competition" were here used not in the limited sense which I would attach to them, but in the broader, more comprehensive, popular sense. While I have not had the opportunity to examine all these authorities, I venture the assertion that nearly all those cases were based upon special legislation in the several States where those opinions were announced.

I recognize the fact that Congress in the past has legislated and given to certain executive or administrative officials certain authority which may have seemed in one sense of the word to have been legislative, but which the courts held to be administrative. I recognize the fact, further, that what may be legislative authority or administrative authority or judicial authority does not always clearly appear. There is a certain twilight zone between the legislative and the administrative, or between the administrative and the judicial, or between the legislative and the judicial, but I submit that there has been no piece of legislation which has been sustained by the courts which goes to the same extent that the pending bill does.

I am not going to take the time this afternoon to examine all these authorities. One of these cases, and perhaps a pioneer case, was Field v. Clark (143 U. S., 649), if I remember correctly the title of the case. The question there arose out of a tariff law. Sugar, hides, and a few other articles were placed upon the free list. Authority was given to the President of the United States by Executive or administrative order to take these articles out of the free list and place them upon the dutiable list if he found that other countries which were exporting to us were enforcing duties which the President deemed unfair or unreasonable in their relation to the commerce of the United States. It was contended in that case that there was a delegation of legislative authority to the President, but the court held that it was not a delegation of authority; that these articles were placed upon the free list and when a certain contingency arose, then certain duties, which had been named in the tariff law, were to prevail, and there was left to the President the mere administrative function of ascertaining whether or not these foreign countries had been guilty of unreasonable or unfair practices in their relation toward the commerce of the United States. In that law Congress fixed the landmarks by legislative authority to serve as a guide to the President.

Later on this question was discussed in Buttfield v. Stranahan (192 U. S., 470). The case was referred to some days ago in the debate on the pending bill. An examination of this case shows that Congress had provided by legislation that after a certain date it would be unlawful for any person to import tea which is inferior in purity, quality, and fitness for consumption to the standards provided for in section 3 of this act, and the importation was prohibited.

Section 2 provided that the Secretary of the Treasury should appoint a board of seven members, experts in tea, who were to fix the standards. Section 3 required that these standards so fixed should be deposited at the different customhouses, and section 4 provided that on making entry at the customhouse of all teas or merchandise described as tea the importer or consignee shall give bond, and so forth, and after the tea shall have been duly examined with reference to its purity, quality, and fitness for consumption it might be removed. If objection were made either on the part of the collector or on the part of the importer to the finding, then an appeal would lie to a board of general appraisers.

It will be noted, first, that the Congress had declared that no tea should be imported unless it measured up to certain standards in purity, quality, and fitness for consumption. It declared, secondly, that there should be certain standards adopted, and that all tea which would be imported must conform to those standards.

Again there was a later case to which I wish to call attention briefly. I refer to United States v. Grimaud (220 U. S., 506). The statute under consideration involved the validity of certain authority which was conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture. I read only a portion of the statute, which is pertinent to the immediate question under consideration.

> The Secretary of Agriculture was authorized to—> make provision for the protection against destruction by fire and depredations upon the public forests and forest reservations * * *.—
> And—
> he may make such rules and regulations and establish such service as will insure the objects of such reservations, namely, to regulate their occupancy and use, and to preserve the forests thereon from destruction, and any violation of the provisions of this act or such rules and regulations shall be punished as prescribed in Revised Statutes, section 5388.

This was a statute to protect the forests from fire. It authorized the establishment of certain rules; in other words, standards were to be provided as in the tea case, and it provided for the punishment, in the event that these rules and regulations thus adopted were violated. The court held that these regulations were adopted within the limitations placed upon the statute and under the authority conferred upon the Agriculture Department and might be enforced. In the syllabus the court says:

> While it is difficult to define the line which separates legislative power to make laws and administrative authority to make regulations, Congress may delegate power to fill up details where it has indicated its will in the statute, and it may make violations of such regulations punishable as indicated in the statute; and so held, that regulations made by the Secretary of Agriculture as to grazing sheep on forest reserves have the force of law, and that violations thereof are punishable under act of June 4, 1897 (ch. 2, 30 Stat., 35), as prescribed in section 5388, Revised Statutes.
> Congress can not delegate legislative power (Field v. Clark, 143 U. S., 692), but the authority to make administrative rules is not a delegation of legislative power, and such rules do not become legislation because violations thereof are punished as public offenses.
> Even if there is no express act of Congress making it unlawful to graze sheep or cattle on a forest reserve, when Congress expressly provides that such reserves can only be used for lawful purposes subject to regulations and makes a violation of such regulations an offense, any existing implied license to graze is curtailed and qualified by Congress.

It will be noted that in this legislation the general law is laid down. The details are to be worked out by the department. We will look in vain to the bill as reported or to the amendment which I propose, if the broader construction is to be placed upon the words "unfair competition," for any detail to guide this commission. Everything is to be left to the commission. It is to make the law, decide the case, and enforce its orders.

Will it be said that practices which neither the courts nor Congress itself have held to be unfair competition shall by the mere ipse dixit of a commission be held to be unlawful? If that is not legislation then I known not what legislation is.

If the broader construction is to be placed upon this phrase, so as to clothe this commission with what is almost supreme power, then we are launching on a sea of doubt without any chart and without any compass to guide us.

Mr. President, my attention the other day was called by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to a recent case reported in 210 Federal Reporter, page 173. It is a decision by the Federal court, Judge Denison, and Sessions and Tuttle, district judges, involving the constitutionality of the so-called "Blue Sky" statute of the State of Michigan. The purpose of the law was "to stop the sale of stocks in fly-by-night concerns." A commission was appointed which was charged with the duty of administering the law.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to refer in detail to all the powers that were conferred upon this commission, but I desire to call attention to this one sentence on page 176:

> If the commission finds that the investment company is not solvent, or that its organization or plan of business is not fair, or that its proposed contracts or other securities are fraudulent or of such a nature that their sale would, in all probability, work a fraud upon the purchaser, or finds that such securities are of such a nature and character as would, in all probability, result in loss to the purchaser, then the sale thereof is to be permanently prohibited.

Note the language: If the commission finds that "its organization or plan of business is not fair."

I read now just a sentence or two from page 181. There is a pretty lengthy discussion of the question as to what constitutes "due process of law" in this opinion, but I will content myself with two or three sentences:

> Of like effect and subject to like infirmity is the provision forbidding the sale of securities if the commission thinks that the company's organization or proposed plan of business is not "fair." Broader and vaguer language could not be chosen. It subjects to the practically uncontrolled discretion of the commission every issue or general sale of stocks, bonds, or securities hereafter to be made in Michigan. For this and the provision regarding probable loss we heard upon the argument and we find in the briefs no claim of justification on grounds of public welfare, and we know of none. They deprive plaintiffs of property, and they do not carry the semblance of "due process of law."

Apply the doctrine of that case to the bill now before the bar of the Senate, which provides that "unfair competition" is unlawful; and I believe I am justified in saying that it is conceded by the friends of this measure that it is proposed to give plenary power to this commission to declare what is and what is not unfair competition. Going into fields that have not yet been surveyed, attempting to declare the law, aye, not to declare the law even, because there is no such provision in this bill or in the amendment which I have offered—and I did not include it, because I believe that we should only give to these words the limited meaning which I attribute to them—Congress sets up for this commission no rules of any kind for its guidance.

The friends of the bill are enthusiastic in the belief that we will have a commission which in dignity and ability will compare favorably with the great Supreme Court of the United States. If this bill becomes a law, I hope that the five best equipped men in the country will be selected to constitute the commission; but there are no five men in this country, I care not what their ability or their character, upon whom I, as an American citizen, believing in American institutions, am willing to confer legislative, judicial, and executive authority at one and the same time. For that reason, if for no other, I would be opposed to giving to this commission, if we could, the unlimited legislative authority or the unlimited judicial authority, as well as the unlimited administrative authority, conferred by the language of this section.

Particularly am I opposed to the section of the bill under discussion which practically says to every corporation that is under suspicion that "we declare your practices illegal; we order you to cease and to desist from a further continuance thereof"; and then says to such corporations, "No; we will not provide a means whereby you can get into the courts unless we choose to begin suit against you for the enforcement of our order."

Mr. President, I recognize the fact that there is much sentiment in favor of a trade commission; I want a trade commission; I am willing to clothe it with all the other powers that are contained in the pending bill, and I am willing to give to it some of the powers contained in section 5 of this bill; but, in my judgment, the bill must be amended so as to give to the aggrieved corporation a right to be heard, and to be heard upon its own petition, and not be placed in the attitude of openly defying an organized tribunal under the Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] to strike out section 5.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I inferred that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] intended to offer his amendment, but inasmuch as he has not done so, I now propose the amendment which I send to the desk to section 5, for the purpose of perfecting the section and having it disposed of before the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to strike out is voted upon. I ask that the Secretary read the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 5 as reported by the committee, except the amendment adopted July 27 at the end of section 5, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 5. That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful.

The commission shall have authority to prevent such unfair competition in commerce, in the manner following, to wit:

"Whenever it shall have reason to believe that any person, partnership, or corporation is violating the provisions of this section it shall issue and serve upon the defendant a complaint stating its charges in that behalf and at the same time a notice of hearing upon a day and at a place therein fixed. The person, partnership, or corporation so complained of shall have the right to appear at the place and time so fixed and show cause why an order should not be entered by the commission requiring such person, partnership, or corporation to cease and desist from the violation of the law so charged in said complaint.

"If upon such hearing the commission shall find that the person, partnership, or corporation named in the complaint is practicing such unfair competition, it shall thereupon enter its findings of record and issue and serve upon the offender an order requiring that within a reasonable time, to be stated in said order, that the offender shall cease and desist from such unfair competition. The commission may at any time set aside, in whole or in part, or modify its findings or order so entered or made. Any suit brought by any such person, partnership, or corporation to annul, suspend, or set aside, in whole or in part, any such order of the commission shall be brought against the commission in a district court of the United States in the judicial district of the residence of the person or of the district in which the principal office or place of business is located, and the procedure set forth in the act of Congress making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies and insufficient appropriations for the fiscal year of 1913, and for other purposes, relating to suits brought to suspend or set aside, in whole or in part, an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall apply.

"If within the time so fixed in the order of the commission the person, partnership, or corporation against which the order is made shall not cease and desist from such unfair competition, and if in the meantime such order is not annulled, suspended, or set aside by a court, the commission may bring a suit in equity in a district court in any district wherein such person or persons reside or wherein such corporation has its principal office or place of business to enforce its said order, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to hear and determine any such suit and to enforce obedience thereto according to the law and rules applicable to suits in equity. All the provisions of the law relating to appeals and advancement for speedy hearing in suits brought to suspend or set aside an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall apply in suits brought under this section."

Mr. CUMMINS obtained the floor.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator a question, do I understand this to be the amendment which he presented last evening?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is the amendment which I proposed last evening, and which has been lying on the table since that time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the Senator offer it as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not; I do not think it would be a substitute for that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair ruled this morning that all amendments for the purpose of perfecting the text have precedence over amendments proposed to strike out the entire section.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Inasmuch as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and several other Senators have submitted amendments to section 5 and I have offered an amendment to strike out that section, I will withdraw my amendment, if I may be allowed to do so, for the present at least.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has that right.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, before I close what I have to say on the amendment which I have just offered I shall review, with such brevity as I can, the arguments made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], but I feel that I ought, in the first instance, to give some attention to the observations just made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], as they relate more directly and immediately to the amendment which I have proposed.

Mr. President, I do not quite understand the position of the Senator from Ohio. He asserts that he is in favor of section 5 if the words "unfair competition" are given the limited meaning which he has in mind, but that he is opposed to section 5 if those words are to be given the meaning which the people generally attach to them in business. Possibly I was not in the Chamber at the time when he stated what this limited meaning is and how it is to be ascertained by the commission. If he did state it during my absence, I regret that I did not hear that portion of his address.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not attempt to define it specifically, except to say that I attached to that phrase only such meaning as it now has under the common law. I further stated that if I thought that these words had the so-called popular meaning which the Senator from Iowa seeks to give to them, or the Senator could persuade me that they had that meaning, I would certainly vote against the entire section.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I neither know to what popular meaning the Senator from Ohio refers, nor do I know the limited meaning to which he alludes. The courts have never declared a definition of unfair competition.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator is correct as to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. The courts have often taken particular facts developed in a particular case, and have declared them to constitute unfair competition. I do not recognize any difference between the technical meaning of unfair competition, as that meaning may be derived from the decisions of the courts, and the so-called popular meaning. There is but one meaning of the phrase. These words relate to commerce, and they do not relate to any other subject, so far as this bill is concerned. The provision reads "unfair competition in commerce." What do the words "unfair competition" mean when applied to commerce?

Mr. POMERENE. Has not the Senator from Iowa, as well as other Senators, been contending that the words "unfair competition" embrace many practices which might not heretofore have been declared to have been unfair competition?

Mr. CUMMINS. Unquestionably. The Senator from Ohio, it seems to me, argues in a circle. If he means to assert that no practice or act that heretofore has not been declared by some court to be unfair competition is not and can not become unfair competition, he has announced, I fancy, his unalterable opposition to this section. If these acts are unlawful now, why do we seek to pass the section at all? Why are we endeavoring to furnish to the people of this country a further remedy, if they already have a remedy for unfair competition which seems to the Senator from Ohio ample and adequate?

As I remarked during the course of his very clear and lucid statement, in every such instance as this there is a principle involved, just as there is one in the phrase "restraint of trade." There are acts which are now being denounced as restraint of trade which were never dreamed of when those words were first employed by the judges of the common law or in the language of commerce.

Does the Senator from Ohio mean to contend that we should draw nothing within the antitrust law, making it unlawful to restrain trade or commerce, that was not known to commerce and to the courts 100 years ago or 75 years ago? He can not, as it seems to me, insist upon any such rule for the interpretation of words and phrases. "Restraint of trade" meant something in England 100 years ago. There was underlying that term a thought. There was in the minds of the people a determination to protect society against a certain evil, and that evil might manifest itself in a thousand different forms. Because the courts prior to 1890 had no opportunity, no occasion to apply that principle to conditions as they now exist, is it to be said that our courts in endeavoring to keep free the channels of commerce in our country must be limited to the narrow scope, the narrow vision, of the judges of Great Britain in a former age? No! I dissent from any such canon of construction or interpretation.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HOLLIS. If the Senator will pardon me, I believe the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Ohio are agreed as to the right of the court to say whether any given case is unfair competition; but what the Senator from Ohio objects to is leaving it to the trade commission to decide that question. His amendment very clearly indicates it, because he adopts the language that is agreeable to the committee, but he provides a method of appeal to the court, so that the decision of the commission may not have even a prima facie prohibition. So far as concerns the right of the court to say what is unfair competition, however, I believe the two Senators are in agreement.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not quite so understand the Senator from Ohio. I understood him to assert that the phrase "unfair competition" as known in commerce did not furnish either a court or a commission with a guide adequate to enable it to apply the standard to a particular fact or combination of facts.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly if anything I have said could be construed by the Senator from Iowa to mean a reflection upon the ability of our courts to declare what is unfair competition. I object to getting five men together, calling them a commission, accepting in good faith the fact that they are thereby clothed with omniscience, and allowing them to create all of this new growth of the common law or to extend it into new fields which heretofore have not been covered.

If we can define it, as a Congress, I shall be glad to have it defined. If we can not define it, I want the courts to define it. I do not want it to be left to the single judgment of the commission itself.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I may have misunderstood the Senator from Ohio, although I listened to him very carefully, and I am glad to be corrected if I have drawn an erroneous conclusion. As I now understand him, he believes that the words "unfair competition" furnish a sufficient rule of law to govern the conduct of the people, but that in applying the law to the particular case we must in all instances resort to the courts and not to a commission. There can be fair difference of opinion with respect to that proposition. I do not believe there can be fair difference of opinion with regard to the adequacy of the phrase "unfair competition" to furnish a rule of law for the government and control of the people of the United States.

I remind the Senator from Ohio, however, that any rule of law sufficient for a court is also sufficient for a commission. I am not now suggesting that the order of the commission can be made final and enforced without review on the part of the courts. That is quite a different matter. I am suggesting, however, that there is no difference between a rule of law as assigned to a commission and a rule of law as assigned to the courts. They are both to be applied to control the conduct of the people over whom they have, respectively, jurisdiction.

If, however, I am wrong with regard to the position of the Senator from Ohio, I certainly have not misunderstood the position of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. They both insist still that the words "unfair competition" are so vague and so uncertain that they can not be declared by the legislative power as a rule of law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I have only made that claim in the alternative. I do not insist that the words "unfair competition" are not words well known to the law, but I insist that if the words in the bill are to be interpreted in their legal sense, then they confer judicial power. If they are not to be construed in their legal sense, as the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] seems to contend they are not to be construed, but are to be given some popular meaning beyond that, then I insist that they are not sufficiently definite to furnish a standard.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. I am not dealing now with the question whether we are delegating judicial power to the commission in this bill. I am speaking only of the meaning of these words as a rule of conduct for the people, as a law to be enforced anywhere, in any jurisdiction that is competent to enforce the law, and I understand the Senator from Utah says that these words are so uncertain and so indefinite that neither court nor commission could apply them to a particular case without exercising legislative power.

When the Senator from Utah was discussing this subject this morning his attention was called generally to the fact that these words had been employed by the courts in the sense which I think they take in the proposed act unaccompanied by any definition or any explanation.

I have in my hand the decree of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois in the case of United States of America against Central West Publishing Co., Western Newspaper Union, American Press Association, and others, defendants. The decree was entered on the 3d day of August, 1912. The second paragraph of the decree reads in this way:

> That the defendants herein and each of them have, both separately and in concert, committed acts in unfair competition against mutual competitors, and that these defendants and each of them as to said matters be permanently and specifically enjoined and restrained from either directly or indirectly, separately or in concert, through their agents or employees, in any manner committing or doing any acts of unfair competition against the competitors of either of these defendants, and that specifically each be permanently enjoined from thus doing or aiding in doing any of the following acts.

I shall not read the subheads of that paragraph.

Then, turning further along to another part of the decree, I find this in paragraph V, an independent paragraph:

> That each of the defendants named in this petition be specifically and permanently enjoined and restrained from combining or joining in any acts—
> (a) Of unfair competition either against another or against any mutual competitor.

I assume that the court which entered this decree believed that these words had a sufficiently definite meaning to indicate to the defendants the course which they should not pursue and that a violation of this paragraph of the decree would subject the defendants to the process of contempt. How were these defendants to know what "unfair competition" is, how were they to avoid violating the decree of the court, if these words are not sufficiently well known in the language of business or commerce to enable them to avoid the things which the court meant they should be prohibited from doing?

The court knew what "unfair competition in business" is. Twenty years of legislation, 20 years of litigation, 20 years of judicial writing, 20 years of general discussion throughout the country, have crystallized the meaning of "unfair competition in commerce," so that it is vastly better understood by the average, the common man, than the words "restraint of trade." I affirm, after long years of examination and study and reflection, that I, at least, understand what "unfair competition" means much better than I understand what "restraint of trade" means; and yet there is no Senator here who questions that the prohibition against restraint of trade is sufficient as a rule of law, and concerning its application a commission may intervene to do anything that a commission may lawfully do. What a commission may lawfully do is a question that I shall discuss later on. I am now concerned only in endeavoring to establish the adequacy of the words "unfair competition," not in any limited sense, not in any technical sense, but as the business to which the words are to be applied understands their meaning.

I also refer to another item of information which indicates how rapidly these words are being applied to the business, not only of the United States but of the world. I desire to read a short extract from an English publication, the Journal of the Society of Comparative Legislation, a very conservative and careful compilation issued from time to time concerning legislation, with comments by distinguished and able authors. I read from the issue (new series, No. XXIX) of October, 1913, a paragraph entitled "Unfair competition":

We have—

Says the author—

We have received from Mr. De Becker, the well-known authority on Japanese law, the text of a draft bill prepared in Japan with respect to unfair competition. It is substantially based on the German law of 1909, with a like object, and is intended to meet cases of fraud and deception not covered by copyright, patent, or trade-mark legislation. Some of the provisions are not much more comprehensive than our common law, but others are far more severe than our law, common or statutory, and give remedies to persons who might not, with us, be able to take proceedings. There is no provision exactly similar to the general provision in the German law, which prohibits all conduct in the way of competition "contrary to good faith."

That is a German provision—"all conduct in competition contrary to good faith." We have not yet in this country advanced far enough or retrograded far enough to justify the use of those words; but I instance them as words used by a civilized, enlightened, and progressive nation in order to accomplish the purpose.

But the terms of the bill—

Proceeds the author—

are so sweeping as to make actionable or penal most of the ordinary tricks of advertisers. The punishments proposed are very severe. For example, penal servitude for three years. Everywhere, it would seem, there are legislative efforts to raise the standard of commercial morality.

I also desire to put in the RECORD a little more fully than it has been heretofore the Australian statute. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] asked me the other day if I looked upon Australia as one of the progressive countries of the world. I very candidly answer that with "yes." It is a progressive community. It has not developed commercially, industrially, as has the United States, nor will it ever reach the development which we enjoy for obvious reasons, but its people are intelligent, are alert, and are endeavoring all the while to maintain the rights of the great mass of the human kind. This is the statute:

Any person who, either as principal or as agent, makes or enters into any contract, or is or continues to be a member of or engages in any combination in relation to trade or commerce with other countries or among the States—(a) in restraint of or with intent to restrain trade or commerce—

I want Senators who have thought that our antitrust law is all that is necessary in the way of legislation, to remember that Australia has a statute against restraints of trade and commerce practically like our own in the words that I have just read, but the Australian statute goes further—or (b) to the destruction or injury of or with intent to destroy or injure by means of unfair competition any Australian industry, the preservation of which is advantageous to the Commonwealth, having due regard to the interests of producers, workers, and consumers, is guilty of an offense.

Then the act proceeds to mention some instances of unfair competition. It says:

For the purposes of section 4—

And what I have read is from section 4—and section 10 of this act, unfair competition means competition which is unfair in the circumstances; and in the following cases the competition shall be deemed to be unfair unless the contrary is proved:

(a) If the defendant is a commercial trust.

(b) If the competition would probably or does in fact result in an inadequate remuneration for labor in the Australian industry.

(c) If the competition would probably or does in fact result in creating substantial disorganization in Australian industry or throwing workers out of employment.

(d) If the defendant, with respect to any goods or services which are the subject of the competition, gives, offers, or promises to any person any rebate, refund, discount, or reward upon condition that that person deals, or in consideration of that person having dealt, with the defendant to the exclusion of other persons dealing in similar goods or services.

Next:

(2) In determining whether the competition is unfair, regard shall be had to the management, the processes, the plant, and the machinery employed or adopted in the Australian industry affected by the competition being reasonably efficient, effective, and up to date.

(3) It shall be a defense to a proceeding for an offense under paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of this section and an answer to an allegation that a contract was made or entered into in restraint of or with intent to restrain trade or commerce, if the party alleged to have contravened this section proves—

(a) That the matter as therein alleged to have been done in restraint of, or with intent to restrain, trade or commerce was not to the detriment of the public; and

(b) That the restraint of trade or commerce affected or intended was not unreasonable.

This is the statute of the Commonwealth of Australia. I know that we have certain constitutional limitations which would prevent the enactment of such a statute in the United States, and I do not assert that it would be wise to enact a statute in all respects like the one I have just read. I am putting it before the Senate simply to show that in the great evolution of business, in the evolution of government and of society, the words "unfair competition" have come to possess a definite, clear, understandable meaning, so that any society can impose upon its members the obligation to refrain from unfair competition, feeling certain that it has given to its members a rule of conduct which they can observe without detriment or danger to themselves.

I have before me a most luminous opinion written by Lord Esher, of the Queen's Bench Division, in the very famous case of the Mogul Steamship Co. against McGregor, decided in 1889. It is a dissenting opinion, but it is just as valuable for the purposes for which I cite it as though it embodied the decision of the court.

While I am mentioning this case I want those Senators who feel so much veneration for the common law and who resist so strenuously any effort to enter new fields and make some laws of our own to remember that in England "restraint of trade" is construed in a way that would not be tolerated in the United States for a single moment. The common law, from which we drew the phrase "restraint of trade," is administered in England so as to permit the most obvious and the cruelest abuses of monopolistic power.

Do you remember what the Mogul Steamship Co. case was? I think we ought to have it in mind as we proceed with this investigation. I intend to read now the facts as found by the court in that case. The facts, as stated in the report of the case of the Queen's Bench Division, reported in 23 Queen's Bench Division, at page 598, are as follows:

The plaintiffs were a shipping company incorporated for the purpose of acquiring shares in certain steamships—the Sikh, Afghan, Pathan, and Ghazee—and became the owners of a large number of shares in these ships, which were built for and employed in the China and Australian trades. The defendants were an associated body of shipowners trading, among other places, between China and London, who formed themselves into a conference or association for the purpose of keeping up the rate of freights in the tea trade between China and Europe and securing that trade—securing that trade to themselves by allowing a rebate of 5 per cent on all freights paid by shippers who shipped tea for Europe in conference vessels only.

That is, in the vessels of the companies which form this combination.

The defendants alleged (and, as it is found in the judgment of Lord Coleridge, C. J., truly alleged) that the large profits derived from the tea freights alone enabled them to keep up a regular line of communication all the year round between England and China, and that without a practical monopoly of the tea trade they must cease to do so. The plaintiffs were admitted to the benefits of this conference for the season of 1884.

I need not at this time read further from the facts. It is sufficient to say that this particular shipowner was compelled to retire from the combination, and that a few years afterwards he brought suit against the combination for the purpose of recovering damages, alleging that his trade had been ruined by the combination, that the tea growers or the exporters from China to England and to Europe would not ship their commodity by any other ships save those which returned the rebate of 5 per cent upon the freight earned during the year.

Is there a Senator or a lawyer anywhere who doubts that an agreement of that kind, if made in the United States and concerning our commerce, would be a violation of the antitrust law? I have never heard a lawyer who even suggested that a contract of that kind would be sustained under the act of 1890.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I be pardoned for just a second? I beg to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa that he does great injustice to the conclusion in the opinion to which he has called attention. While it is true, as I remember the case, that the dissenting opinion sets forth views sustaining the view of the Senator, the majority opinion, decided by Lord Bramwell and Sir James Hennen, in that case merely makes a distinction between them and Lord Esher as to the ground whether damages could be recovered, but all of them condemn the thing as being unfair competition.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. I may say that the case afterwards went to the House of Lords, and the opinion or opinions there delivered were of the same tenor.

Mr. LEWIS. The Adelaide Steamship Co. case, July 25, 1913, received such approval that the principles recited in it had their affirmance in the House of Lords.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before taking my seat, I may say that I have an opinion delivered in the House of Lords, I think in February of this year, in a case that would have received instant condemnation under the antitrust law, but which sustained the doctrine that under the proof there was no cause of action under the common law of England.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ASHURST. Before I present the matter I wish to say to the Senator, and I thank him for yielding, that I wish to make a report from the conference committee on the Indian appropriation bill. I understand that it may entail some little discussion; I do not know how much; it may be 10 minutes. I do not want to have the Senator yield without knowing the time that might be covered.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that the consideration of the conference report is privileged as well as its presentation, and therefore if the Senator from Arizona desires to enter upon its consideration I shall make no objection.

Mr. ASHURST. I only wished to ask the pleasure of the Senator from Iowa. I would not do it unless the Senator from Iowa would be glad to have me present the report.

Mr. CUMMINS. It matters not to me. On the whole I think, as far as I am concerned, it would be wise to pursue a policy that would dispose of all the conference reports, and therefore I shall not interfere nor would it be at all inconvenient to me if the Senator desires to go on with the consideration of the report.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Iowa that the sooner we get these conference reports out of consideration the better; but I wish to suggest to the Senator that he is not quite right in his statement that the consideration of the conference report is privileged. The presentation of it is privileged, but I hope there will be no objection to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. CUMMINS. I raised that question the other day and understood the Chair to say that under the rules if the Senator from Arizona, who presents the report, desired to make a motion to proceed to the consideration of the report the motion would have precedence over any other matter pending before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is what the Chair decided.

Mr. GALLINGER. To that I assent, when it is accompanied by a motion.

Mr. ASHURST. Do I understand that the senior Senator from New Hampshire has objected to the consideration of the conference report?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There has been no objection at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Quite the contrary, I will say to the Senator, I think he is acting wisely to get the conference report acted upon as soon as possible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The conference report will be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12579) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 37.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 81, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$200,000"; also in lieu of the sum proposed in the amendment of the Senate numbered 98 as agreed to in conference insert "$49,700"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 139, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed insert: "That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to make a per capita payment to the enrolled members of the Chickasaw and Cherokee Tribes of Indians of Oklahoma entitled under existing law to share in the funds of their respective tribes or to their lawful heirs, out of any moneys belonging to said tribes in the United States Treasury or deposited in any bank or held by any official under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, said payment not to exceed, in the case of the Chickasaws, $100 per capita, and in the case of the Cherokees not to exceed $15 per capita, and all said payments to be made under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: Provided, That in cases where such enrolled members or their heirs are Indians who by reason of their degree of Indian blood belong to the restricted class, the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, withhold such payments and use the same for the benefit of such restricted Indians: Provided further, That the money paid to the enrolled members as provided herein shall be exempt from any lien for attorneys' fees or other debt contracted prior to the passage of this act"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 155, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed insert: "It appearing by the report of the Joint Congressional Commission created under section 23 of the Indian appropriation act approved June 30, 1913 (S. Doc. No. 337, 63d Cong., 2d sess.), that the Indians of the Yakima Reservation in the State of Washington have been unjustly deprived of the portion of the natural flow of the Yakima River to which they are equitably entitled for the purposes of irrigation, having only been allowed 147 cubic feet per second, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to furnish at the northern boundary of said Yakima Indian Reservation in perpetuity enough water, in addition to the 147 cubic feet per second heretofore allotted to said Indians, so that there shall be during the low-water irrigation season at least 720 cubic feet per second of water available when needed for irrigation; this quantity being considered as equivalent to and in satisfaction of the rights of the Indians in the low-water flow of Yakima River and adequate for the irrigation of 40 acres on each Indian allotment; the apportionment of this water to be made under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $635,000 to pay for said water to be covered into the reclamation fund; the amount to be appropriated annually in installments upon estimates certified to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury. One hundred thousand dollars is hereby appropriated to pay the first installment of the amount herein authorized to be expended, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to prepare and submit to Congress the most feasible and economical plan for the distribution of said water upon the lands of said Yakima Reservation, in connection with the present system and with a view to reimbursing the Government for any sum it may have expended or may expend for a complete irrigation system for said reservation"; and the Senate agree to the same.

HENRY F. ASHURST,
MOSES E. CLAPP,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN H. STEPHENS,
C. D. CARTER,
CHARLES H. BURKE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]—for I could not catch it from the rapid reading of the report—what disposition is made of the Choctaw fund, and whether or not the agreement reached by the conferees excludes the Mississippi Choctaws?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in reply to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi I will state that amendment numbered 139, which provided for a per capita payment to the enrolled members of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Cherokee Tribes of Indians in Oklahoma, was the subject of much discussion. The conferees were unable to agree with reference to that amendment as incorporated in the bill by the Senate, but finally agreed to an amendment in substance as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make a per capita payment to the members of the Chickasaw and Cherokee Tribes—

And so forth, leaving out any reference whatever to the Choctaws. Obviously, therefore, the Secretary of the Interior will be without power to make a per capita or other payment to the Choctaws, either in Oklahoma or Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. Pardon me just a moment. The conferees felt, however, that because there was a disagreement as to whether or not the Mississippi Choctaws should share in the fund it would not be just or salutary legislation to deprive the Chickasaw and Cherokee Tribes in Oklahoma of the money which all admit is due them.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Then, the rights of the Choctaws, whatever they may be, are still protected?

Mr. ASHURST. Absolutely.

Mr. VARDAMAN. And under the terms of this agreement the fund belonging to the tribe will not be disbursed in any way?

Mr. ASHURST. Under no circumstances, so far as this pending legislation is concerned.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Very well. That is all I desire, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have a word further to say in connection with the amendment in relation to the appropriation for carrying on the work of reclamation on the Flathead Indian Reservation, to which I invited the attention of the Senate when the previous conference report was made. The bill as it came from the other House carried an appropriation of $100,000 for the continuance of this work. That sum was increased by the Senate to $250,000. The conferees now agree on an appropriation of $200,000 for the work on that project.

I am not going to oppose the motion to adopt this conference report, but I am not willing to allow the present opportunity to pass without saying a word of protest in connection with that feature of the bill. Just exactly what actuated the Indian Bureau to recommend any such insignificant appropriation as $100 000 in the first place I have been unable to learn; but upon calling the attention of the Secretary of the Interior and the head of the Indian Bureau and the Director of the Reclamation Service to the condition of affairs, they all agreed, and very readily agreed, that the appropriation ought to be at least $250.000. The Director of the Reclamation Service said before the Committee on Indian Affairs that the appropriation, in fact, ought to be $500,000 in order to carry on work with the economy with which it ought to be prosecuted.

Mr. President, as I said here upon the floor the other day, this project contemplates the expenditure of probably $5,000,000. At the rate fixed by the present appropriation it will take just 25 years to finish up that project, upon which there has already been expended practically $1.500,000. It started with an appropriation of $50.000 in the year 1908, which was for the preliminary work only; in 1909 an appropriation of $250,000 was made; in 1910 there was an appropriation of $250.000; in 1911 there was an appropriation of $400,000; in 1912, for some unexplainable reason, that was cut down to $200,000; in 1913—Sixty-second Congress—the bill carried an appropriation of $400 000, but concert of action between the two Houses was impossible, and it failed in the expiring hours of the last Congress. That sum was again recommended, but was cut down a year ago to $325,000. Now we must content ourselves with $200,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. May I ask the Senator from Montana to what particular project he is referring?

Mr. WALSH. The Flathead Indian Reservation project.

Mr. GALLINGER. A reclamation project?

Mr. WALSH. It is a reclamation project.

Mr. GALLINGER. And according to the way we are now appropriating, it will take some 25 years to complete it?

Mr. WALSH. At the present rate of appropriation we can not hope to have this project completed inside of 25 years.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if the work which has already been done is being utilized, to any great extent, for the benefit of the people who reside on the project?

Mr. WALSH. It is not being utilized, and it will be impossible to utilize it until the great main canals are constructed. The money is now being expended in the construction of those canals.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, we are manifestly, in view of the small appropriations that we are making annually, pursuing a wasteful policy in that matter?

Mr. WALSH. Altogether so. As a matter of course, the overhead charges are going to be enormous. I invite the attention particularly of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] to that feature of this matter. They have exhibited a devotion to the interest of the Indians there which is in the highest degree creditable to them; but they will bear in mind that the burden of all of this expense must fall upon the Indians, as well as upon the whites; they must each bear their due share of the extra cost involved in this wasteful method. By this system an inexcusable burden of overhead charges is imposed upon them.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the Government is losing the interest on the money that is being invested year by year?

Mr. WALSH. It is unproductive.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is unproductive.

Mr. WALSH. So, Mr. President, the appropriation ought to have been $400,000. We labored to get $250,000, and this body very readily agreed that that appropriation ought to be made. We are now compelled to acquiesce in this diminished appropriation, a most unjust discrimination against the people most directly interested.

But, Mr. President, while I am talking about that matter, I want to advert to a few other related wrongs.

The people upon this reservation have the most just cause of complaint, and of serious complaint, at the manner in which they have been treated by the Government of the United States. The Flathead Indian Reservation was opened by act of Congress in the year 1904. That act provided that the lands should be surveyed; that allotments should be made to the Indians; and that after allotments had been made to them the whites were to be permitted to enter and to select lands, paying the appraised value and complying with the homestead law to acquire title. At the same time the act made provision for carrying on this work of reclamation. The Indians were invited to select their lands under the irrigation project by reference to a map of the reservation indicating the area to be irrigated. The whites were invited to select their lands from among those under that irrigation project, all with the implied representation upon the part of the Government that the work of reclamation should be carried on with a reasonable degree of celerity, so that they might avail themselves of the water for the cultivation of their lands. They all did so, and now Congress pursues a policy which, if adhered to, means that the next generation, not this one, will enjoy the advantages that the works were intended to bring.

Not only that, Mr. President, but there was reserved from the lands open to appropriation those adjacent to the Pend d'Oreille River, for power sites—a very appropriate reservation—in the expectation that some legislation would be speedily passed by Congress looking to the disposition of the same, that the great possibilities of power there could be realized. People were attracted to that locality by reason of the prospects in that regard, but 10 years have passed without a law on the statute books to permit the appropriation of any of those lands. Within that reservation, at the outlet of Flathead Lake, is one of the greatest power sites, Mr. President, west of the Mississippi River; indeed, I might say, west of the Great Lakes. It lies there absolutely undeveloped. A rising city, the town of Polson, was built up near it, in the reasonable expectation that the reclamation project would be carried on and that the power possibilities would be speedily developed, or, at least, that Congress would pass some legislation that would permit them to be developed. These hopes have been very largely vain.

Furthermore, the act of 1904, opening this reservation, provided that the lands should be classified and that the timberlands within the reservation should be sold. It has been deemed wise down to the present time not to sell the timberlands. It was expected that sawmills would be constructed there and that the timber would be cut, and that the lumber industry would be extensively carried on.

Again, it was proposed that all around the Flathead Lake within the reservation, the lands should be surveyed and laid out in small plots for the construction of villas and cottages, the region affording unexcelled attractions for summer residences. Though the lands were reserved the work has been delayed unaccountably, so that the expected tourists have not come. Altogether disappointment upon disappointment has come upon those people until they are on the very verge of despair.

We hoped to get a reasonable appropriation at least for carrying on of this work of reclamation; but we have been obliged, in this situation of affairs, to fight at every stage of the proceedings in order to get recognition for it.

I do not like, Mr. President, at this time to oppose the adoption of this report upon the matter of a difference between $200,000 and $250,000 for this work; but I do not want to have this bill passed without the Senate being fully apprised of the situation which confronts us.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Is there any reason to believe that after 75,000 acres of land have been reserved to the Indians there remains enough of the reservation, when converted under the terms of the statute to which the Senator has referred, to reimburse the Government for the $5,000,000 incurred to construct the irrigation project?

Mr. WALSH. The matter has all been figured out, and it has been ascertained that the lands under the irrigation project are ample to repay the amount; but, in addition to that, the timberlands are likewise in a way pledged, as are all the other resources of the Indians as well as the lands of the whites under the project.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The entire reservation and all the resources that may be carved out of it are available for that purpose?

Mr. WALSH. I entertain no doubt whatever with regard to that.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. A great hue and cry has been raised here that there was a proposition to take away from the Indians valuable existing property rights that they had and to devote them to the uses and to the interests of the white settlers there. Is there any such plan as that at the bottom of that scheme?

Mr. WALSH. I had the honor to canvass that question with the Senate a few days since. The act is very plain in its terms. It originally provided for the construction of that irrigation work and for the reimbursement of the amount expended on it; then it provided that settlers could go in and take the unallotted lands. The law provides that the ratable amount chargeable against the lands of the whites should be paid by them in annual installments running over a period of 15 years, and that the amounts chargeable against the Indians' lands should be reimbursed to the Government out of the Indian funds realized by the sale of the unallotted lands, including the timber and other resources.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Why has it become necessary to construct this particular irrigation project at the expense of the general revenues of the Government instead of taking the necessary amount out of what is known as the reclamation fund?

Mr. WALSH. I will be glad to answer the Senator. That is exactly what is done in connection with all reclamation projects on Indian reservations. The general reclamation act can not be made applicable to an Indian reservation. I will explain to the Senator why. It provides that the amount expended shall be repaid to the Government by those who take the land under the reclamation project. The expense of the project is assigned and distributed to the lands watered by it. When the beneficiaries are white they may be relied upon to pay back the money in regular annual installments. When you come to a project, however, on an Indian reservation, while you may rely upon the whites to repay annually the amount which is chargeable against their lands, you can not rely upon the Indians to pay anything out of their own funds, so that the amount due from the Indians is made payable out of the tribal funds, and thus the general fund is reimbursed.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. "Tribal funds" is a misleading phrase. Does not the existence or nonexistence of tribal funds depend upon an excess of acres or upon timber rights or water-power sites for the creation of such a fund?

Mr. WALSH. Exactly so. The Indian contributions come from the sale of the lands to the whites. A valuation is put upon the lands the whites take, and they are obliged to pay the price fixed, in addition to meeting the requirements of the homestead law. The money thus realized goes into the tribal fund; the amount received from the sale of timberland goes into the fund; the amount received from the sale of villa sites and any amount that may be paid for mineral lands—all of that goes into the fund. If that fund should be inadequate—that is to say, if the Indians' resources shall not——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Outside of the 75,000 acres reserved for occupancy by the Indians?

Mr. WALSH. If the Indian funds thus accumulated shall not be enough to pay the contribution that should come from the Indian lands, the Government makes just exactly that much expenditure for the Indian; that is all.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It makes a donation of that much to that particular scheme?

Mr. WALSH. It does.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Would it not be of value to the Senator presenting that matter to Congress hereafter to have made an accurate statement showing just exactly what the value of that reservation would be without the irrigation scheme, what it would cost to install it, and how much of it would never be repaid by reason of exempting from the lien or from the obligation of repayment the 75,000 acres of land reserved for the Indians, thereby giving the Congress some sort of reliable basis upon which to determine whether or not the Congress of the United States was not taking out of the general revenues an amount of money to create one of these irrigation schemes in that particular locality?

Mr. WALSH. The present bill contains a provision calling upon the Secretary of the Interior to report to Congress just exactly the details which the Senator suggests it is important to have.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The provision in the conference report provides for that?

Mr. WALSH. The bill as it now stands contains such a provision.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, do I understand that under no circumstances can the 75,000 acres that are set apart for the Indians be taken to pay the shortage to the Government?

Mr. WALSH. Absolutely none. The Indians are absolutely secure in their allotments, no matter what may be the result of this work. The only trouble is that it may be in the next generation before any of them get any water for use on their lands at the present rate of appropriation.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I heartily concur in all that my colleague has said about this proposition, and wish to join him in all thereof.

I am thoroughly imbued with the justice and meritoriousness of this project. I am thoroughly acquainted with the project. I am acquainted with its history from its inception and the conditions that prevail under it. It lies in my part of the State, and is something with which I am more than ordinarily familiar. I have devoted a great deal of time, work, and attention to it since I have been in the Senate; but, particularly in the last year, at every inch of the proceedings I have been met with stubborn and persistent opposition, as though the project were a fraud and were something that was not based on right or merit. I know, however, that that conception is entirely erroneous and is due to a mistaken understanding.

I believe this project has been very unjustly dealt with and discriminated against by the Indian Bureau and by this Congress, and that it is unfair and unjust and a waste of money to deal with it as it has been dealt with. To begin with, this year the Indian Bureau started out by making the ridiculously small recommendation and estimate of $100,000 for it. The project would take 50 years to complete at that rate, and everybody connected with it who might get any benefit from it, either Indians or whites, would be dead before the expiration of that time. The bureau now admits that it was mistaken, that it was in error, and that $250,000 ought to be appropriated to the project; but owing to the fact that the appropriating legislation had started out on the basis and recommendation of $100,000 in the House, it is now hard to get what is due to the project, and get it right. It has been opposed at every stage of the proceeding.

I believe $200,000 is an inadequate appropriation, and nothing like what ought to be appropriated to this project in the interest of economy, fairness, and justice to both whites and Indians. It is the one project of the West from which there has been no complaint from either Indians or whites as to the basis of procedure on which it is conducted, the only complaint from either Indians or whites being in behalf of larger appropriations and quicker completion of the work, in order that all might get their benefits the sooner therefrom.

This project, I believe, has not received adequate consideration from the Indian Bureau or from the House or from the Senate; but, rather than have any further disagreement over this appropriation, I shall not oppose the report of $200,000.

From the beginning I have devoted my best efforts and labors and energies to explaining this project to the bureau and to Congress, and to trying to get it before the bureau and before Congress in the right light—not so forcibly and clearly, perhaps, as my colleague has done, but to the best of my ability—and yet it seems I have not been able to get either the bureau or Congress to see it in its true light according to its rights and merits.

While I believe the project is not getting what it ought to have in the interest of right and economy, under the circumstances, at this late day, I shall not make any objection to the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On yesterday the Chair laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives, in which the House receded from its disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered 23 and agreed to it with an amendment thereto—"in lieu of the sum proposed insert $10,000."

The original House bill contained the clause:

For expenses of the Board of Indian Commissioners, $4,000, including not to exceed $300 for office rent.

The Senate amended that to read "$25,000." The House receded from its disagreement, but inserted in lieu of that sum "$10,000."

It seems that the conferees have not taken this amendment into consideration in the conference. The Chair believes that the Chair has the right to put the question to the Senate as to whether the Senate will concur in the amendment of the House. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the amendment is concurred in.

Now the question is on agreeing to the conference report. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the conference report is agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 28, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God Almighty, let Thy spirit come in all fullness in the hearts of Thy children; that wars and rumors of wars shall cease to be; since war is abhorrent to man's highest ideals and peace in accordance with his best thought. "Ah! when shall all men's good be each man's rule, and universal peace lie like a shaft of light across the land?"

"How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace; that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation; that saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth!"

Hear us, O God our Father, in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 17041), and I ask unanimous consent that the statement of the House conferees be read in lieu of the report

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. UNDERWOOD). The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement of the conferees on the part of the House.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1025).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17041) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 45 and 91.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 138 and 146, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 44: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by the said amendment insert the following:

"The President is authorized from time to time, as the exigencies of the service may require, to rearrange, by consolidation or otherwise, the several customs-collection districts and to discontinue ports of entry by abolishing the same or establishing others in their stead: Provided, That the whole number of customs-collection districts, ports of entry, or either of them, shall at no time be made to exceed those now established and authorized except as the same may hereafter be provided by law: Provided, further, That hereafter, the collector of customs of each customs-collection district shall be officia ly designated by the number of the district for which he is appointed and not by the name of the port where the headquarters are situated and the President is authorized from time to time to change the location of the headquarters in any customs-collection district as the needs of the service may require: And provided further, That the President shall, at the beginning of each regular session, submit to Congress a statement of all acts, if any, done hereunder and the reasons therefor."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 92: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 92, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to accept patented lands or rights of way over patented lands in the Glacier National Park that may be donated for park purposes (acts May 11, 1910, vol. 36, p. 354, secs. 1, 2; June 23, 1913, vol. 38, p. 49, sec. 17)."

R. 17041) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the said amendments, namely:

On amendments Nos. 44 and 45: Strikes out the provisions, proposed by the Senate, creating the customs-collection districts of Kansas City, Mo., and of Tampa, Fla., and inserts the following general provision with reference to the customs service:

"The President is authorized from time to time as the exigencies of the service may require to rearrange, by consolidation or otherwise, the several customs-collection districts and to discontinue ports of entry by abolishing the same or establishing others in their stead: Provided, That the whole number of customs-collection districts, ports of entry, or either of them, shall at no time be made to exceed those now established and authorized except as the same may hereafter be provided by law: Provided further, That hereafter the collector of customs of each customs-collection district shall be officially designated by the number of the district for which he is appointed and not by the name of the port where the headquarters are situated, and the President is authorized from time to time to change the location of the headquarters in any customs-collection district as the needs of the service may require: And provided further, That the President shall, at the beginning of each regular session, submit to Congress a statement of all acts, if any, done hereunder and the reasons therefor."

On amendment No. 91: Strikes out the appropriation of $237,840, proposed by the Senate, for the Hot Springs Reservation in Arkansas.

On amendment No. 92: Appropriates $75,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $100,000, as proposed by the Senate, for Glacier National Park, including the construction of a road from the old town of St. Mary through a part of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation.

On amendment No. 138: Appropriates $25,000, as proposed by the Senate, for the fish hatchery in Utah.

On amendment No. 146: Inserts the provision, proposed by the Senate, with reference to the Government exhibit at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, including authorization for an exhibit of the American National Red Cross.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
SWAGAR SHERLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this is a final report on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

As finally agreed on the bill carries $110,072,377.39. It is reduced below the amount as it passed the Senate $2,198,911.17. It is increased over the amount as passed by the House $2,126,018.11. It is $16,303,650.44 less than the estimates and $14,617,571.48 less than the sundry civil bill for the last fiscal year.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I notice that in the agreement of the conferees the provision is made that hereafter the collector of customs of each customs-collection district shall be officially designated by the number of the district instead of by the name of the port. What is the effect of that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Senate incorporated two amendments creating new customs districts——

Mr. MURDOCK. Those at Tampa and Kansas City?

Mr. FITZGERALD. One at Tampa and one at Kansas City. A number of requests have been submitted to increase the number of districts, to create new districts, or to rearrange some of the existing districts. These are matters that should not be settled, and no attempt should be made to settle them, in the disposition of the appropriation bills, and yet such amendments are always placed upon appropriation bills. Under the law to-day the President has the authority to rearrange, or to modify, or to change the internal-revenue districts. So the conferees have inserted in this bill, in lieu of the two amendments creating new districts, a provision which gives the President authority from time to time, as the exigencies of the service may require, to rearrange districts, or to change the boundaries of districts, or to discontinue districts or ports of entry, but in no case to increase the number above that fixed by law, unless the number is increased by Congress.

Some of the complaints that have been made relative to the existing districts are due somewhat to the fact that two important cities which formerly were ports of entry are now included in one district, and there is some jealousy because the district is named after one city rather than the other; so that it is here provided that the district shall be known as district No. so-and-so.

Mr. MURDOCK. That obviates that jealousy.
